The Journal is approaching its 10th anniversary, which is a great pleasure for us. The modest issue numbers is nothing to be ashamed of in this small area of science, especially if we consider that free on-line access is also available for our readers.

Thoroughly observing the cover it can be noticed that a horse's leg appears as a new pattern on the ever changing front page. Its not that we ran out of human skeleton patterns, but in this issue to our great pleasure there are two articles dealing with the biomechanical questions of the use of horses in human therapy, and this is symbolized by the cover.

However in Volume X. serious, although not affecting the basic concept of journal, but significant changes are planned, about which it is too early to say more, but I can tell it targets a significant enlargement of the reading and publishing camp. We hope our efforts will succeed.

In the mean time we are awaiting articles, comments, or suggestions.
