Abstract— One of the measures to combat the COVID-19 pandemic was lockdown, prophylactic isolation, quarantine and the promotion of teleworking. These circumstances generated a context conducive to fostering the consolidation of the digital presence, in various dimensions, in the lives of individuals (at least some of them), companies and even countries. This digital transformation at the micro, meso and macro levels offers profound opportunities for sustainable development. However, it is a mistake to think that all countries, companies and organizations and individuals are equally prepared to deal with the digital, either as consumers or much less as producers given their digital literacy. All this is challenging but may also accentuate pre-existing inequalities, or create new ones.

Keywords— COVID-19, digital, digital literacy, sustainable development.
