R EPRESENTATIONS OF POLITICAL POWER IN MIEVEAL ICELAND: ÍSLENDINGABÓK

Costel Coroban

“Valahia” University of Târgoviște, E-mail: coroban_costel@yahoo.com

Abstract:

This paper aims to analyse emblematic sources from the Golden Age of literature in High Medieval Iceland, such as Íslendingabók, from the point of view of the ideology of power, in order to compare the findings to those from other sources of the time. If in Norway towards the 13th century all power gravitated around the person of the King and the institution of the court, in Iceland the political situation from the assembly of the Alþingi in 930 up to the country's annexation (1262) was wholly different, owing to the different political organization of the Old Icelandic Commonwealth (Þjóðveldið). The Icelandic political milieu has not been researched very extensively from the point of view of political ideology, as one of the pioneers of this approach, Jón Viðar Sigurðsson noted. There is much to be said on the subject of the worthiness of the Icelandic Family sagas as useful in describing the political ideology of power due to their role as both historical and literary sources. These skaldic texts were sponsored with specific purposes by rulers who understood how songs and stories could improve a leader's position and prestige. As a similarity to the literature sponsored by the kings of Norway, the texts created in Iceland during the literary miracle of the Middle Ages had a greater importance for those chieftains who did not enjoy a strong position, who were either attempting to legitimate themselves as rulers of newly usurped positions, or who were threatened by stronger neighbouring rulers.

Rezumat:

Scopul acestei lucrări este de a analiza surse din Epoca de Aur a literaturii din Islanda medievală, cum ar fi Íslendingabók (Cartea Islandezilor) din punctul de vedere al ideologiei puterii, cu scopul comparării rezultatelor cu analize ale altor izvoare ale vremii. Dacă în Norvegia către sfârșitul secolului al 13-lea toată puterea politică gravita în jurul persoanei regelui și a instituției Curții regale, în Islanda situația politică de la întrunirea Althing-ului din anul 930 p.Chr. până la anexarea țării de către Norvegia (1262) a fost cu totul diferită. Aceasta s-a datorat organizării politice diferite a vechiului stat Islandez liber (Þjóðveldið). Mediul politic islandez din perioada Evului Mediu nu a fost cercetat amănunțit din punctul de vedere al ideologiei politice, după cum aprecia unul din pionierii acestei abordări, istoricul Jón Viðar Sigurðsson. Ar exista multe aprecieri de făcut în legătură cu oportunitatea utilizării unor surse cum ar fi saga de familii islandeze drept izvoare pentru identificarea unor elemente de ideologie politică, datorită rolului lor atât de sursă literară cât și istorică. Aceste texte scaldice au fost sponsorizate de către conducători care erau conștienți de puterea unor saga de a le mări prestigiul. Ca o asemănare cu literatura promovată de către regii Norvegiei, aceste texte create în Islanda în timpul miracolului literar al Evului Mediu aveau o importanță mult mai mare pentru acei șefi locali islandezi care nu beneficiau de o poziție politică prea puternică, aceștia încercând astfel să se legitimizeze drept conducători ai unor fiefuri uzurpate, sau folosit puterea propagandistică a saga drept mijloc de apărare împotriva unor vecini amenințatori.

Keywords: medieval Iceland, power, ideology, Bishop Gizzur, Ari fróði

Introductory aspects

Probably one of the best known literary production of Medieval Iceland and the earliest vernacular prose work¹ is the Book of Icelanders (also known as Saga of the Icelanders or Libellus Islandorum). It was written in Old Norse² by Ari fróði Þorgilsson (1067–1148) during the early 12th century (circa 1122–1133), and is regarded by most scholars as the first history of Iceland and the foundation of Icelandic literature. The manuscripts are preserved at the Árni Magnússon Institute for Icelandic Studies in Reykjavík in two documents (AM 113 a fol and AM 113 b fol) copied in the 17th century by priest Jón Erlendsson at the indications of Bishop Brynjólfur Sveinsson (14th September 1605 – 5th August 1675) of Skálholt from an original copy from the 12th century that had been lost afterwards.

Ari Þorgilsson, the celebrated author of Íslendingabók was praised by Snorri Sturluson as “truly learned about past events both here and abroad...eager to learn and having a good memory” as well as having a “perceptive intellect”³. Despite such examples of praising, more modern commentators have found Ari's Íslendingabók lacking in details and breadth. Siân Grønlie, in the introduction to his translation of the saga, considers that this fault of narrowness of Íslendingabók is owed to the "ideological basis" that lied behind the writer's intentions, namely his partiality regarding certain families or chieftains⁴. Unlike family sagas or the Norwegian king's sagas, Íslendingabók remarkably avoids elaborate or detailed references to myths (with the exception of the second appendix) or to Christian bias in its first folios, even including historical genealogies and lists of law-speakers and bishops, therefore being one of the medieval Icelanding writings closest to modern historical works⁵.

¹ Judy Quinn, "From orality to literacy in medieval Iceland" in Margaret Clunies Ross, Old Icelandic Literature and Society (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000), 30–60.

² In the present work I shall be using the translated version of Siân Grønlie, Íslendingabók. Kristni Saga, Viking Society for Northern Research (London: University College London, 2006).

³ Einar Haugen (ed.), First Grammatical Treatise: The Earliest Germanic Phonology, 2nd ed., (London: 1972), 12–13, 32–33 and Snorri Sturluson, Íslenzk fornrit (Reykjavík: 1933), 5–7, apud Grønlie, ix.

⁴ Grønlie, x.

⁵ Diana Whaley, „A useful past: historical writing in medieval Iceland” in Ross, 161-202.

Figure 1. First page of Íslendingabók from AM 113 b fol. 1r, source: <https://handrit.is/>

Political Power, Context and Purpose in Íslendingabók

The Book of the Icelanders is divided in ten chapters with a Prologue in the beginning and a Genealogy at the end (the last two chapters are also lists of the bishops and lawspeakers of Iceland). What interests the present study the most are instances where the political ideology behind the organisation of Iceland are explained. In one of the few studies on the political ideology of Iceland, Norway and the Orkneys, the historian Jón Viðar Sigurðsson points to the fact there have been few analyses of political ideology from this comparative perspective⁶. The same scholar compares the characteristics of chieftains in Icelandic family sagas (such as Íslendinga saga) as well as contemporary sagas (Sturlunga saga, Orkneyinga saga) to the qualities of kings found in sources such as Heimskringla, Sverris saga and Hákonar saga Hákonarsonar, to conclude that “there was a fundamental difference between kings on the one hand, and earls and chieftains on the other, even though the same terms were used to describe their personal abilities. The king was above all other men”⁷ and that later these differences became redundant as the kings legitimized their power by divine grace⁸. The question arises to what extent Ari Þorgilsson’s Íslendingabók prescribes certain important qualities of political leaders, and whether these may be found in similar Icelandic or Norwegian sources.

⁶ Jón Viðar Sigurðsson, „Kings, Earls and Chieftains. Rulers in Norway, Orkney and Iceland c. 900-1300” in Gro Steinsland, Jón Viðar Sigurðsson, Jan Erik Rekdal, Ian Beuermann (eds.),

Given the importance of law in Icelandic society,⁹ a short digression on the legislative setting is required before delving more deeply into the political milieu of Commonwealth Iceland. The written law played an important part in the political evolution of Iceland, as law dictated in the relations between the goðar, Church and the people. In Íslendingabók it is mentioned that the first law code of Iceland was introduced by Úlfljótr, a Norwegian,¹⁰ around the year 930. This law was written after the model of the Gulapingslög, a 10th century law code of Norway (the “log” of the Gulaping, one of the earliest Norwegian assemblies that took place on the west coast of the country)¹¹. This law of Úlfljótr was changed in local things before the Althing was established, by which time the code of Icelandic laws became the collection later known as Grágás (Gray Goose Laws, called so due to their antiquity, or because they had been written in goose quill or bound in Ideology and Power in the Viking and Middle Ages. Scandinavia, Iceland, Ireland, Orkney and the Faroes (Boston: Brill, 2011), 70.

⁷ Ibid., 101.

⁸ Ibid.

⁹ The widespread assumption exists that early medieval Icelandic society was one of free farmers that maintained its cohesion in spite of the absence of a monarch and of a large number of what could be considered barons or nobles, thus constituting one of the earliest example of a liberal society. See Thomas J. McSweeney, „Writing Fiction as Law: The Story in Grágás”, Paper presented at the 2014 Law and Humanities Junior Scholar Workshop, Columbia Law School, The Center for the Study of Law and Culture, on-line at <http://www.law.columbia.edu/sites/default/files/microsites/gender-sexuality/mcsweeney.gragas.5.14.14.docx>, accessed 8 May 2017, 18:41 PM.

¹⁰ Íslendingabók, chapter II.

¹¹ Jón Viðar Sigurðsson, “Changing Layers of Jurisdiction and the Reshaping of Icelandic Society c. 1220-1350” in Juan Pan-Montojo, Fredrik Pedersen (eds.), Communities in European History: Representations, Jurisdictions, Conflicts (Pisa: Pisa University Press, 2007), 174 (pp. 173-187).

goose skin parchment)¹². After 1264, when Iceland was annexed by Norway, the Grágás were replaced initially by Járnsíða (introduced seven years after the annexation, the rather repressive Ironside laws were rapidly dropped in 1282) and then by Jónsbók, also based on the Norwegian National Law but with major modifications regarding royal taxation and copying some parts of the municipal law. Concomitantly, the Church in Iceland adopted the Christian Law (kristinréttir) between 1122 and 1133, which was replaced in the Althing after 1275 with a new reformed law¹³.

From Íslendingabók we learn, first of all, that those who spoke in the Althing – on the occasion of modifying the local calendar, be they höfðingi or not – were sagacious men: “they were both very wise men” (chapter IV). Little other information is offered in the early chapters regarding chieftainship or the chieftain’s relations to the King of Norway. The relations between the Icelanders and the Norwegian monarchy stands out in regards to the process of the Christianization of the country (Siân Grønlie advises that Íslendingabók may be read entirely as an ecclesiastical or missionary history¹⁴). Thus we find out that King Óláfr Tryggvason (ca. 960-1000) felt offended when the missionary Þangbrandr returned unsuccessful from Iceland¹⁵. The King’s political ambition of having a united, subdued and Christian Iceland explain his harsh reaction, as he wanted “to have those ... who were there in the east maimed or killed for it”¹⁶. This shows that in Arni’s time (the first half of the 12th century) there existed the perception that the king of Norway had seen it as his duty to Christianize and eventually control Iceland, a country where many Norwegians resided but one that was outside the power of the king. Hence it could be argued that around the middle of the 12th century Christianity was imagined as a vector for the expansion of the Norwegian king’s power. This hypothesis is aided by the argument that Íslendingabók, with its references to Iceland as a distinct realm, represents a nation-building

¹² The Grágás are preserved in two manuscripts – which are actually two different versions of it – Konungsbók (Copenhagen, Royal Library, GKS 1157 fol, written circa 1260) and Staðarhólsbók (Reykjavík, Árni Magnússon Institute for Icelandic Studies, AM 334 fol, written circa 1280).

¹³ Sigurðsson 2007, 175.

¹⁴ See the introductory study in Grønlie, xli-xlv.

¹⁵ Íslendingabók, chapter VII.

¹⁶ Ibid.

document in the context of the “emergent sense of Icelandic identity in the early twelfth century”¹⁷.

Returning to the qualities of political leaders in Iceland as evident in Íslendingabók, we learn that Skapti fióroddsson (who became lawspeaker and held the office for 27 years, when his uncle, Grímr Svertingsson, from Mosfell, bestowed upon him the office due to his voice becoming hoarse), was appreciated as a just ruler and a peace promoter: he created a Fifth Court for appeals against cases in which witnesses or where juries could not reach a decision, decreed that nobody could be pronounced guilty for a murder except the killer, exiled or outlawed chieftains and powerful men who were guilty of violence or crime¹⁸. Justice represents a desirable attributes for kings too. It appears as one of the king’s most important attributes in Konungs skuggsjá, together with wisdom¹⁹. Justice is part of the four cardinal virtues existent in medieval political thought, together with prudence, temperance and fortitude; in the medieval political ideology, a just ruler gives everyone his due (according to the famous dictum: *suum cuique tribuere*²⁰), as detailed by Engelbert of Admont’s De regimine principum and other 13th century works of ethics and philosophy²¹.

Bishop Gizurr (in office 1082-1118) is likewise lauded for his achievement of having introduced the tithe. This is praised in Íslendingabók as an accomplishment that had been possible thanks to the popularity of Bishop Gizurr and the persuasion of Sæmundr²². Ari admits that convincing the population to correctly declare the value of their possession in order for it to be taxed required great political skill and obedience on behalf of the Icelanders towards Gizurr. Therefore it seems safe to assume that Bishop Gizurr possessed the qualities of a chief. Scholar Siân Grønlie, in one of the notes to his joint edition of Íslendingabók and *Kristni saga*²³,

¹⁷ Grønlie, xxiv.

¹⁸ Íslendingabók, chapter VIII.

¹⁹ See Sverre Bagge, The Political Thought of the King’s Mirror (Odense: Odense University Press, 1987), 94-95, 108-109.

²⁰ This Latin phrase comes from Aristotelian philosophy and has been made famous by Cicero in De Natura Deorum where he says “Iustitia suum cuique distribuit” (III, 38) and also by being included in Emperor Justinian’s Institutiones „iuris praecepta sunt haec: honeste vivere, alterum non laedere, suum cuique tribuere” (1,1,3-4).

²¹ István P. Bejczy, The Cardinal Virtues in the Middle Ages. A Study in Moral Thought from the Fourth to the Fourteenth Century (Boston: Brill, 2011), 213.

²² Íslendingabók, chapter X.

²³ Grønlie, 71.

points out that in quite a few sagas Bishop Gizzur is presented as a possible chief, Viking chieftain and even king. Thus, in Hungrvaka (found in Íslenzk fornrit, Reykjavík, 1933, XV 16²⁴) we are told that: “Everyone wished to sit or stand as he commanded, young and old, rich and poor, women and men, and it was right to say that he was both king and bishop over the land he lived”²⁵. To this example, Siân Grønlie juxtaposes Haraldr Sigurðarson’s praise of Gizzur: ““He could be a viking chieftain, and has the makings for it. Given his temperament, he could be a king, and that would be fitting. The third possibility is a bishop, and that is probably what he will become, and he will be a most outstanding man”²⁶ (from *Morkinskinna*²⁷).

Figure 2. The Constitutional structure of the Icelandic Commonwealth after ca. 1030. Source: Gunnar Karlsson, The History of Iceland (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2000), 23.

Ari also praises Gizzur’s great administrative capabilities in establishing the first Icelandic episcopal see at Skálholt, endowing it with lands as well as other possessions and for giving up his land for the creation of a second Icelandic bishopric, according to the indications received from Norway. Another accomplishment and proof of good administration was the census held during Gizzur’s time “and at that time there were a full 840 in the Eastern Fjords Quarter, and 1200 in the Rangá Quarter, and 1080 in the ²⁴ Hið íslenska fornritafélag (The Old Icelandic Text Society) founded in 1928 published many editions of Icelandic sagas with rich comments and introductions.

²⁵ Grønlie, 71.

²⁶ Ibid.

²⁷ Theodore M. Andersson, Kari Ellen Gade (transl.), Morkinskinna. The Earliest Icelandic Chronicle of the Norwegian Kings (1030–1157), Islandica 51 (New York: Ithaca, 2000), 255, quoted in Grønlie, 71.

Breiðafjörðr Quarter, and 1440 in the Eyjafjörðr Quarter”²⁸. Such examples of good governance that are found in Íslendingabók are comparable to descriptions of chieftains. For example, in Sturlu saga it is said that Oddi Þorgilsson was “better spoken than most other men” and vitr, “clever”²⁹. Historian Jón Viðar Sigurðsson shows that most sagas only ascribe one quality to the Icelandic chieftains of renown, while the earls of the Orkneys are portrayed with two to four features and the kings of Norway with five to six characteristics³⁰. Judging by these standards, Bishop Gizzur’s description in Íslendingabók is similar to that of the early earls in *Orkneyinga saga*³¹. Perhaps this is explainable because he was a bishop whose power and scopes were greater than those of a chieftain, and whose lineage (genealogy) was nobler than that of a simple chief.

In regards to wisdom, culture and education as attributes of leader, Íslendingabók only refers to such qualities as belonging to certain notable men that spoke in the Althing – as seen above – and to bishops. Thus, Bishop Ísleifr of Skálholt (1056-1080), described as “far abler than other clerics”³², and as having attracted the admiration of many chieftains who sent their sons to study with him (two of whom, the source tells us, later became bishops), therefore proving the value they ascribed to education. The fact that Bishop Ísleifr’s three sons became chieftains is also presented as a merit of their father’s renown³³, and Ari mentions – as an act of reverence – that he personally had been present at Bishop Ísleifr’s death when he was only 12 years old and that it “was on a Sunday, six nights after the feast of Peter and Paul, eighty years after the fall of Óláfr Tryggvason”³⁴. Discussing wisdom as an attribute in the sagas, Jón Viðar Sigurðsson observes that:

²⁸ Íslendingabók, chapter X.

²⁹ Sturlu saga, Sturlunga saga, Ch. 6, apud Sigurðsson 2011, 73.

³⁰ Sigurðsson 2011, 73-74.

³¹ Such as, for example, that of Earl Erlendr Haraldsson, who “went off on Vikings trips. He was an exceptional man, talented in almost every way, open-handed, gentle, always ready to take advice and much loved by his men, of whom he had a large following” Hermann Pálsson and Paul Edwards (eds.), The history of the Earls of Orkney, (London: Penguin Classics, 1981), 184 apud Sigurðsson 2011, 73.

³² Íslendingabók, chapter IX.

³³ Ibid.

³⁴ Ibid.

The most common word for describing wisdom in the Old Norse sources is vittr, and in a few episodes a person is depicted as stórviðrir or allra manna vitrastr. None of these words were, however, reserved for secular leaders only, not even the terms stórviðrir or allra manna vitrastr. [...] It is obvious that because of the king's superior position he had to be cleverer than other men. It is, however, more difficult to explain why the sagas attach such small importance on the earls' shrewdness. [...] However, to be a good military leader one also had to be intelligent. Thus the sagas underline the earls' wisdom indirectly.³⁵

Bishop Ísleifr position as wise church leader (officially he was a missionary bishop, in partibus infidelibus, not a see holder) means that he was learned man, so this trait was something that was expected of him as an ecclesiastical leader. This description of him could also be used as an example to argue that in Ari's time greater emphasis was laid on the role of bishops as state-builders in the earlier history of Iceland than on the role of chieftains, or, on the contrary, to prove Ari's bias in favour of the role of Christianity and the Church in earlier times in Iceland.

³⁵ Sigurðsson 2011, 73.

Figure 3. A goði leading the people during a sacrifice to Thor. Painting by J. L. Lund, Source: <http://www.arild-hauge.com/arild-hauge/j-l-lund+offerscene.jpg>

Wisdom as a character trait stands out in Hákon saga Hákonarsonar where the king is presented not only as wise but also as well educated and having a culture that permitted him to read Latin as well as Old Norse, and as a patron of the letters who commissioned translations of riddarasögur into Old Norse³⁶. In his study of Konungs skuggsjá, Sverre Bagge found that “the king’s virtue above all was wisdom.... ‘Fyrir þui at... gud hefir gefit þier spekt ok manuit. Þa gættu ríkisstiornar með uitrligu rettdæmi...’”³⁷. While ³⁶ See Costel Coroban, “Shaping Medieval Political Ideology in High Medieval Norway: King Hákon Hákonarson as Patron of Letters and Knight-Erudite” Annals of the „Ovidius” University of Constanta – Political Science Series 5 (2016), 139-156.

³⁷ “Because I find that God has given you wisdom and understanding, I charge you to govern wisely and justly” Konungs skuggsjá part III, apud Bagge, 90.

Bishop Ísleifr in Íslendingabók is commended for his wisdom in a more practical manner (his intelligence having attracted high born students and having allowed him to consolidate the first bishopric of Iceland), the quality of wisdom described in Konungs skuggsjá is from the Old Testament and follows the model offered by the medieval philosophical model of the four virtues³⁸. In Konungs skuggsjá an allegory of Wisdom describes all that wisdom helps in, including practical matters such as agriculture, trade, economic development, art, schools and education but also judgement and law, therefore both pragmatic as well as idealistic matters³⁹. In Íslendingabók, Bishop Gizurr's wisdom and prestige is likewise praised when Ari points out that it was he who recommended the consecration of Þorlákr Þórhallsson as Bishop of Skálholt, despite being ill and not being able to attend the Althing: "...everyone acted in accordance with his instructions, and this was obtained because Gizurr himself had urged it so strongly; and Þorlákr went abroad that summer and returned out here the next, and had then been consecrated bishop"⁴⁰.

One very important point when discussing the ideology of power in Íslendingabók is the depiction of the Norwegian monarchy in this source. It is worthwhile to mention that there is little evidence, if any, of a contestation of any of the actions of the monarch. On the contrary, Ari seems to implicitly approve of the policy of the Norwegian monarch. A sign of reverence to Norwegian institution of kingship is the fact that dates are calculated according to the rule and lives of different Norwegian kings. There are many examples of this kind of devotion in Íslendingabók. For example, we are told from the beginning that "Ísland byggðist fyrst ór Norvegi á dögum Haralds ins hárfagra..."⁴¹, that Ingólfr brought the law to Iceland "when Haraldr the Fine-Haired was sixteen years old"⁴² and that the colonisation of the island was completed in six decades, when Hœngr from Rangá became lawspeaker "one or two years before Haraldr Hárfagri died, according to the reckoning of wise men"⁴³. In the last example we ³⁸ István P. Bejczy, The Cardinal Virtues in the Middle Ages. A Study in Moral Thought from the Fourth to the Fourteenth Century (Boston: Brill, 2011), 215.

³⁹ Bagge, 91.

⁴⁰ Íslendingabók, chapter X.

⁴¹ "Iceland was first settled from Norway in the days of Haraldr the Fine Haired...", Íslendingabók, chapter I.

⁴² Íslendingabók, chapter I.

⁴³ Íslendingabók, chapter III.

find out that the wise men of Iceland awarded great importance to the rule of King Haraldr, therefore positioning the Norwegian monarch as the main authority they looked to. In Íslendingabók we are also told that the Christianisation of Iceland took place the year “Óláfr Tryggvason fell... fighting the king of the Danes, Sveinn Haraldsson, and the Swedish Óláfr, son of Eiríkr at Uppsala, king of the Swedes, and Eiríkr Hákonarson, who was later earl in Norway”⁴⁴. In this example we see not only a reference to the king of Norway, but also to the most important leaders of the time, which was probably aimed to emphasize the importance of the event of the adoption of the Cross in the country’s history. The insinuation remains that this crucial event is also linked to the figure of the Norwegian king, the author implying that the success of the Christianization of Iceland could be seen as the crowning of King Óláfr Tryggvason’s efforts at the end of his rule and life, completing the circle opened by Ari in the beginning of Íslendingabók’s chapter VII: “King Óláfr, son of Tryggvi, son of Óláfr, son of Haraldr the Fine-Haired, brought Christianity to Norway and to Iceland”⁴⁵.

Figure 4. King Haraldr Hárfagri (c. 850 – c. 932) receiving Norway out of his father's hands in an illumination from Flateyjarbók (GkS 1005 fol.).

⁴⁴ Íslendingabók, chapter VII.

⁴⁵ “Óláfr konungr Tryggvasonr, Ólafssonar, Haraldssonar ins hárfagra, kom kristni í Norveg ok á Ísland”, Íslendingabók, chapter VII..

Other examples of using the reign of Norwegian kings as reference points appear when we are told that the revered lawspeaker Skapti Þóroddsson, nephew of lawspeaker Grímr Svertingsson, “died in the same year that Óláfr the Stout fell, son of Haraldr, son of Goðrøðr, son of Björn, son of Haraldr the Fine-Haired, thirty years after Óláfr Tryggvason fell”⁴⁶. Just like in the previous example, the reference does not simply allude to one Norwegian king, but to an entire lineage of rulers, eventually as far back as Haraldr Hárfagri’s time, when Iceland was colonised. In another example, it is told in Íslendingabók that Bishop Ísleifr was consecrated “in the days of King Haraldr of Norway, son of Sigurðr, son of Hálfðan, son of Sigurðr Bastard, son of Haraldr the Fine-Haired”⁴⁷. From reading the same source we are also informed that Kolbeinn Flosason became lawspeaker the year “King Haraldr fell in England”⁴⁸, i.e. 1066, and that Bishop Ísleifr passed away “eighty years after the fall of Óláfr Tryggvason”⁴⁹, that Bishop Gizzur “was consecrated bishop at the request of his countrymen in the days of King Óláfr Haraldsson”⁵⁰.

Closing observations

Such examples prove how important it was for Ari to establish a connection back to one of the most venerated Norwegian kings, the unifier of Norway, Haraldr Hárfagri, during the time of which the kingdom was formed simultaneously with the colonisation. Therefore, the author does not seem to share the idea that the colonists came to Iceland as a result of the Norwegian king’s tyranny, otherwise less reference would have been made to royal dynasty. It might seem obvious that a population of colonists should refer to the leaders of the country their ancestors were born in, but in the Middle Ages the reference to the ruling years of other monarchs were always done as part of a political recognition of their authority and never without carrying a political message. For example, the early Popes of ⁴⁶ “En hann andaðist á inu sama ári ok Óláfr inn digri fell Haraldssonr, Goðrøðarsonar, Bjarnarsonar, Haraldssonar ins hárfagra, þremr tígum vetra síðar en Óláfr felli Tryggvasonr” Íslendingabók, chapter VIII.

⁴⁷ “...á dögum Haralds Norvegskonungs Sigurðarsonar, Hálfðanarsonar, Sigurðarsonar hrísa, Haraldssonar ins hárfagra.” Íslendingabók, chapter IX.

⁴⁸ Íslendingabók, chapter IX.

⁴⁹ Ibid.

⁵⁰ Ibid., chapter X.

Rome that came from Greece (in the period roughly from 678 to 752) sometimes dated their letters using the regnal years of the Emperor in Constantinople,⁵¹ whose approval they required in order to be ordained, much like various Icelandic goði or bishops, who received the mandate to Christianize their country or the approval of their ordination from the Norwegian king, in a similar relation of dependence. Possible counter-arguments might include the fact that Ari refers not only to Norwegian kings but also to Popes and to English monarchs like King Edmund (the Martyr, ca. 855-869) as well as to the Emperors of Constantinople, Alexios I Komnenos (1056-1118) and Phocas (602-610), and to the first King of Jerusalem, Baldwin I (1100-1118) and Patriarch Arnulf of Jerusalem (1099, 1112-1118) too. For example, at the end of chapter VII it is stated that:

Bishop Gizurr died thirty nights later in Skálaholt on the third day of the week, the fifth [day] before the calends of June.

In the same year Pope Paschal II died before Bishop Gizurr, as did Baldwin king of Jerusalem and Arnulf patriarch in Jerusalem, and Philip king of the Swedes and, later the same summer, Alexius king of the Greeks; he had then sat on the throne in Miklagarðr for thirty-eight years. And two years later a new lunar cycle began.

Eysteinn and Sigurðr had then been kings in Norway for seventeen years after their father Magnús, son of Óláfr Haraldsson. That was 120 years after the fall of Óláfr Tryggvason, and 250 years after the killing of Edmund, king of the Angles, and 516 years after the death of Pope Gregory, who brought Christianity to England, according to what has been reckoned. And he died in the second year of the reign of the Emperor Phocas, 604 years after the birth of Christ by the common method of reckoning. That makes 1120 years altogether.⁵²

This probably stems from the ecclesiastical character of Íslendingabók or possibly from the desire of Ari to write a pompous ending to his book, an expression of his sagacity, as he would later be called fróði. Probably the first reason is the one that bears the greater weight. Looking at this gallery of leaders mentioned in Íslendingabók, Historian Poul Skårup suspects that the writer's inspiration came from a version of Fulcher of Chartres's *Historia Hierosolymitana*⁵³, which contains references to Alexios I, Baldwin I and Patriarch Arnulf of Jerusalem⁵⁴ (this chronicle is one of the most appreciated chronicles of the First Crusade, written by Fulcher of Chartres, who was a participant in the event, it is considered rather accurate and it is thought that it remains one of the most important sources for contemporaries as well). The reference to King Edmund the Martyr – who ruled East Anglia but little is known about his reign from the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle other than he fell victim to Viking raids, suggesting he might have been mentioned as an ecclesiastical figure who was greatly venerated in church tradition in the North⁵⁵ – may be considered surprising, while, for instance, Emperor Alexios I Comnenos is well-known in Old Norse literature as Kirjalax (Gr. kyrios, κύριος = Lord), has a saga dedicated to him (*Kirjalax saga*⁵⁶) and is remembered for having received King Eiríkr the Good (of Denmark) and King Sigurðr Jórsalafari in Miklagarðr (Constantinople).

⁵¹ Andrew J. Ekonomou, Byzantine Rome and the Greek Popes: Eastern influences on Rome and the papacy from Gregory the Great to Zacharias, A.D. 590–752 (Lexington Books, 2007), 218. Also see Rosamond McKitterick, “The Papacy and Byzantium in the Seventh and Early Eight-century sections of the Liber Pontificalis” Papers of the British School at Rome 84 (2016), 241–273.

⁵² Íslendingabók, chapter VII.

⁵³ See Edward Peters (ed.), The First Crusade (Philadelphia: Philadelphia University Press, 1971).

⁵⁴ Poul Skårup, "Ari frodes dødsliste for året 1118" Opuscula, 6 (1979), 18-23 apud Grønlie, 30.

⁵⁵ Also known as St. Edmund, he was King of East Anglia from circa 855 to his death on 20 November 869 (when the king was allegedly slain by Ivar the Boneless and his brother Ubba after refusing to give up his faith in Christ). The cult of St. Edmund was revived after the 10th century with hagiographies such as Passio Sancti Eadmundi by Abbo of Fleury or legends like De Infantia Sancti Edmundi by Geoffrey of Wells greatly contributing to St. Edmund being worshipped as a martyr and to the creation of his image as a sacral king through his example of faith, sacrifice and sense of duty at the early age of 29 when he was martyred. Mark Taylor, Edmund: the Untold Story of the Martyr-King and His Kingdom (Fordaro, 2013), 27-43.

⁵⁶ See Rory McTurk, A Companion to Old Norse-Icelandic Literature and Culture (Victoria: Blackwell Publishing, 2005), 198-199.

Figure 5. Bishop Jón Ögmundsson of Hólar (1052-1121) in one of the few illustrations of an early medieval Icelandic bishop. Source: <http://www.katolsk.no/biografier/historisk/jholar>

The power of the Norwegian king is to a great extent never contested in Íslendingabók, which supports the argument that from the point of view of political ideology, the source does not fail to appear as a declaration of faith to the Norwegian throne. For instance, Ari explains that, in the beginning, King Haraldr Hárfagri had the power to impose a tax of five ounces of silver on those who travelled to Iceland⁵⁷. The demeanour of the king is not commented or contested in any way, such as, for example, would be the case in other sources.

⁵⁷ Íslendingabók, chapter I.

Bibliography

Primary Sources

Andersson, Theodore M. and Kari Ellen Gade (transl.), Morkinskinna. The Earliest Icelandic Chronicle of the Norwegian Kings (1030–1157), Islandica 51. New York: Ithaca, 2000.

Grønlie, Siân, Íslendingabók. Kristni Saga, Viking Society for Northern Research. London: University College London, 2006.

Pálsson, Hermann and Paul Edwards (eds.), The history of the Earls of Orkney. London: Penguin Classics, 1981.

Secondary Sources

Bagge, Sverre, The Political Thought of the King's Mirror. Odense: Odense University Press, 1987.

Bejczy, István P., The Cardinal Virtues in the Middle Ages. A Study in Moral Thought from the Fourth to the Fourteenth Century. Boston: Brill, 2011.

Coroban, Costel, "Shaping Medieval Political Ideology in High Medieval Norway: King Hákon Hákonarson as Patron of Letters and Knight-Erudite" Annals of the „Ovidius” University of Constanta – Political Science Series 5 (2016), 139-156.

Ekonomou, Andrew J., Byzantine Rome and the Greek Popes: Eastern influences on Rome and the papacy from Gregory the Great to Zacharias, A.D. 590–752. Lexington Books, 2007.

Haugen, Einar (ed.), First Grammatical Treatise: The Earliest Germanic Phonology, 2nd ed., London: 1972.

Karlsson, Gunnar, The History of Iceland. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2000.

McKitterick, Rosamond, "The Papacy and Byzantium in the Seventh and Early Eight-century sections of the Liber Pontificalis" Papers of the British School at Rome 84 (2016), 241–273.

McSweeney, Thomas J., "Writing Fiction as Law: The Story in Grágás", Paper presented at the 2014 Law and Humanities Junior Scholar Workshop, Columbia Law School, The Center for the Study of Law and Culture, on-line at <http://www.law.columbia.edu/sites/default/files/microsites/gender-sexuality/mcsweeney.gragas.5.14.14.docx>, accessed 8 May 2017, 18:41 PM.

McTurk, Rory, A Companion to Old Norse-Icelandic Literature and Culture. Victoria: Blackwell Publishing, 2005.

Peters, Edward (ed.), The First Crusade. Philadelphia: Philadelphia University Press, 1971.

Quinn, Judy "From orality to literacy in medieval Iceland" in Margaret Clunies Ross, Old Icelandic Literature and Society. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000. 30-60.

Ross, Margaret Clunies, Old Icelandic Literature and Society (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000).

Sigurðsson, Jón Viðar "Changing Layers of Jurisdiction and the Reshaping of Icelandic Society c. 1220-1350" in Juan Pan-Montojo, Fredrik Pedersen (eds.), Communities in European History: Representations, Jurisdictions, Conflicts. Pisa: Pisa University Press, 2007. 173-187.

_____, "Kings, Earls and Chieftains. Rulers in Norway, Orkney and Iceland c. 900-1300" in Gro Steinsland, Jón Viðar Sigurðsson, Jan Erik Rekdal, Ian Beuermann (eds.), Ideology and Power in the Viking and Middle Ages. Scandinavia, Iceland, Ireland, Orkney and the Faroes. Boston: Brill, 2011. 69-108.

Skårup, Poul, "Ari frodes dødsliste for året 1118" Opuscula, 6 (1979), 18-23.

Taylor, Mark, Edmund: the Untold Story of the Martyr-King and His Kingdom. Fordaro, 2013.

Whaley, Diana, "A useful past: historical writing in medieval Iceland" in Ross, Margaret Clunies, Old Icelandic Literature and Society. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000. 161-202.