Unified Dataset Version Round 1a

Codebook

December 2016

Missing Value Codes: Two numerical codes are used to mark data points that have missing values. Each code denotes a different reason as to why a value is missing for a particular data point:

-888. Not Provided – A non-missing value could conceivably exist for the data point, but it has not been provided for some reason. In some cases, such a value will be missing because it is not readily obtainable (e.g., it was never recorded or shared). In other cases, such a value will be missing because efforts to collect it for this database have not yet been made.

-999. Not Applicable – A non-missing value does not conceivably exist for the data point. This occurs when a question/variable has not conceptual relevance to a particular case.

Of these two codes, -888 is used as the default code for missing values in this dataset.

C.III. Political Leader Selection

We conceive of most parties as having one or more leaders who perform the following functions:

a) Party Political Leader (political leader, person whose endorsement would be needed for major policy or organizational changes within the party, person who would appear on television to speak on behalf of the party on important political issues).
b) Party Administrative Leader (top administrative leader of the extra-parliamentary party). Sometimes called the General Secretary.
c) Party Electoral Leader, presumed top candidate in next legislative election. In Westminster systems, and in many incumbent parties, the Electoral Leader is usually synonymous with the Political Leader. In some opposition parties, and in parties where the PM has announced that s/he will not stand again, and in parties that have a formal selection process for the electoral leader, this position may be vacant until shortly before an election.

Example 1: UK Labour Party 2012: Ed Miliband was the Party Political Leader and became the Party Electoral Leader when he took that post. The Party Administrative Leader (called the General Secretary) was Iain McNicoll.

Example 2: Dutch Labour Party 2012 (PvdA): Diederik Samsom was elected Party Political Leader. He was named Party Electoral Leader as the result of a separate process. The Party Administrative Leader (called the Chair) was Hans Spekman.
