Republicans, for the most part, are hypocritical. Anyone who is extremely political tends to be.
user1

I'd easily agree that Republicans are hypocritical. They often declare intent on repealing and replacing things, with no actual plans set forth on what to do afterwards.
user2

Well, they have plans. The plans just come into focus after they obtain a position of power and can then act on things they previously stated they wouldn't do.
user1

A good example is the Supreme Court. The senate insisted that a President shouldn't be allowed to appoint a Justice near the end of their term under a Democrat President, but under a Republican, appointed as many as possible with the Republican President almost out the door.
user2

Very true. But, it is a Machiavellian approach to politics. Gaining power by any means is justified because they believe once they have it their direction is necessary.
user1