I think they are both equally hypocritical
user1

both democrats and republicans are humans and therefore are biased
user1

so they will overlook logic flaws in their arguments when talking about emotionally charged issues
user1

Generally I think they are both hypocritical equally. However, within the past week I've noticed more double standards in during speeches from the Republicans.
user2

I agree with you.
user2

really? have any specific examples?
user1

The Republicans have been quick to give moment of silences and sending thoughts and prayers but are quick to say "let's not politicize" this in regards to gun violence but...
user2

one of the largest examples is the republican argument to ban abortion but not interfear with gun ownership because it is "their choice" and protected
user1

But it is an issue that can onlybbe solved by political decisions (gun restrictions) such as background checks etc.
user2

that's a pretty good example
user1

All democrats really do is blame republicans for their inaction
user1

They have been quick to shut down discourse very quickly because it is evident access to guns is out of control
user2

they spent all of the trump years saying how much good they can do for the country if they were in control
user1

but it is still the same old stuff
user1

I have noticed democrats this week pleading for action such as with H.R. 8. It's been waiting in the Senate but McConnell won't take it for a vote
user2

I am unfamiliar with that but doesnt the senate majority leader have the power to bring bills to the floor?
user1

admittedly the democrats have a very slim majority in the senate
user1

I may be wrong but isn't that Mitch?
user2

Or Nancy... My brain isn't functioning well today
user2

i think it is nancy haha
user1

or is she the house majority leader
user1

I think mitch is the minority leader as the republicans do not have a morjoity
user1

either way there has been a lot of inaction from both sides
user1