Well, I am a democrat so I might be a bit biased here, but I would say republican are more hypocritical.
user1

I think both are very hypocritical, but I think republicans are slightly more so. Taking their pro life stance, for example, they claim to care about the life of an unborn child, but they will do nothing to help care for the mother or the child once it is born. Republicans don't offer any form of financial or social support to mothers, and refuse to take actions that would help keep schools safer from mass shootings.

One example where we can see this is in the abortion debate.
user1

I agree Lia. That was where my example was going to go, but you beat me to it!
user1

Another area we can see this in is in financial matters.
user1

For example, conservatives long touted their belief in limiting expenditures but this has gone by the wayside since Bush Jr.
user1

Exactly, now republican politicians are well known for their lavish vacations and frequent golfing trips, and none of the republican voter base seems to take any issue with it
user2

Reublicans are just as likely to spend significantly on programs as Democrats, but these programs tend to benefit the wealthy, despite the fact that they like to claim these policies are helping the poor.
user1

Yes, that as well!
user2

ted cruz comes to mind when thinking about lavish vacations :)
user1

He's a perfect example haha
user2

But yes absolutely on the policy expenses. They're supposedly in favor of less government spending, but are entirely for bailing out large businesses and tax cuts for the ultra rich
user2

To be fair, Democrats has a good deal of hypocritical behavior as well. For example, republicans have some good points in the current debate about cancelling debt.
user1

While cancelling debt would help a large swatch of people around the country, it is true that many of these will be people who don't need the help from the government as much.
user1

My biggest issue with the hypocrisy of Democrats is that they will always talk about what needs to be done but refuse to actually do anything about any problems, even when they have the power to do so.
user2

The poorest among us tend to be people without any higher education, so debt cancellation will not help them.
user1

Yeah. It is frustrating now when the dems have the house the senate and the presidency and still can't get much done.
user1

A lot of this, though, comes down to the filibuster and the fact that they can't get anything meaningful through the senate.
user1

It's true, our system of government currently makes it extremely difficult to get things done correctly and fairly.
