I don't know if hypocrisy is a partisan feature or topic.

I think it is

I think it's easy to criticize specific stances or points of view as hypocritical, but it's something that often carries across the parties and more relates to entrenched figures, or people who are in office for disingenuous reasons.

There's a lot of discourse about Republicans being hypocritical for their support of Putin over Biden, for example, but still calling themselves patriots, but I think the issue of insider stock trading by Congresspeople is also concerning.
user1

I think republicans are more hypocritical. A lot of republicans talk about god and things like that but they exclude people. They look down on people for being different.

I don't think anyone in congress should be allowed to own stocks.
user2

I agree with that, but that's a stance and not something intrinsic to being Republican. There are plenty of Christian and Catholic Democrats both good and bad, it's the dominant theology in America.

Fully agree about the stock ownership issue, or they should at least be held in blind trust.
