I think Republicans are more hypocritical.
user1

So we have Republicans going on about how abortion is murder.
user1

Well, obviously I would think republicans are more hypocritical, however, I am trying to become more tolerant because there is alot of intolerance and nothing is getting done
user2

And when mass shootings happen, they say that nothing can be done to prevent them.
user1

The whole abortion issue, to me, is about equal rights for women and their ability to make choices.
user2

They attack Biden for the formula milk shortage, and then vote against bills to rectify the issue.
user1

Amazingly enough, the most homophobic Republicans themselves have turned out to be homosexuals themselves.
user1

Such hypocrisy.
user1

I am keeping a list of reprentatives and senators, who don't support gun control and advocating against them. Atleast start with background checks. Or maybe if people who had guns had to go through the same thing that women go through to get an abortion, it might be better.
user2

They cite bodily autonomy when advocating against vaccine mandates, but somehow that doesn't apply when it comes to the issue of abortion
user1

I don't care about sexual preferences, I just want to engage in civil discourse and find common enough ground that we can begin a conversation, and then follow with facts to maybe enlighten our neighbors and republican friends about some of the important issues.
user2

That is not really the topic of conversation here
user1

You are completely right about the vaccine mandates and how it doesn't apply to abortion. I had'nt really considered that.
user2

So yes, Republicans are definitely a lot more hypocritical compared to Democrats.
user1

There's just no competition there.
user1

Just complaining about republicans isn't going to change anything. I think engagement is important. I have been thinking alot about influence. Who is the most influential? Is it the hypocritical Republicans? We can agree on that. Why are they so influential, when it seems obvious, that they are wrong?
user2