Hello! For me, I think the most hypocritical are the Republicans.
user1

As we can see recently, we see the republicans representing their states illustrating a shift in desire for gun rights but also still not willing completely support it
user1

I think that democrats can appear more hypocritical because I think thereâ€™s a lot they say they wanna do but donâ€™t get to do and I think republicans are pretty straightforward with their views.
user2

I can see that, but the straightforward also don't get done as well
user1

I agree with what you said. And I think that for a lot of the parties, thereâ€™s a lot of dreaming but not a lot doing,
user2

I think that at least the democrats don't falter as much against their own words, especially with the major concerns like gun rights, immigrations, and such
user1

I agree completely! both have a lot of talking but not a lot of actions to move forth
user1

I was disappointed in videos statement about getting things done but not realizing heâ€™s the president and HE needs to get the gun reform/restrictions fixed
user2

That is true about democrats. I do think their general values are consistent
user2

I feel that democrats are more likely to move a bill or such with their views, whereas the republicans are content with the conditions they are in right now, as it doesn't directly affect the officials in office and they know that they have their rights
user1

For me, the values and how they (republicans) twist them to serve their needs and purposes during different situations make it very hypocritical
user1

for democrats, they also do that, but we see them also restraining themselves for cases that illustrate repeats and also altercations with their previous statements
user1

what do you think?
user1

republicans struggle to cohesively defend their statements and viewpoints without ultimately stating that its their given rights, which while true, also conflicts with the current period and situations (needing change to resolve these issues)
user1