I think Republicans are more hypocritical, they would say one thing but do another.
user1

Is anyone here?
user1

To me, there is considerable hypocrisy across the aisles because of the need to win elections and the disinterest in policymaking by enough legislators. I think this leads to a large amount of hypocrisy, with activist politicians from both parties seeking attention and few partnering to do the work of the nation.
user2

In general I agree, Republicans seem more out of touch with their values.
user2

How do you see Republicans on the whole? I am used to seeing them stand for something but that rarely seems to be the case.
user2

Republicans seem not helping the fellow average "Joe". Most people that are supporting Republicans are not falling the same categories as Republicans are
user1

That's really interesting, because the Republicans seem to be gaining with the average "Joe". I think they are better at winning elections, and staying on message. The Democrats have a hard time connecting with the people they should.
user2

They just wants to align themselves with Republicans because they wants to fit in which is rich or "I own a business" but in reality they don't own a corporation that Republican's policy that will directly benefit them.
user1

I agree with you, that Republicans do not help the average "Joe"; it's surprising more people that traditionally support Democrats are voting Republican.
user2

That's a good point about Republican voters.
user2

I never thought that how they viewed themselves would change how they vote.
user2