Hello.
user1

Hello! Nice to meet you!
user2

You too!
user1

I guess I'll open up the discussion fist if that's okay with you
user2

*first
user2

No problem
user1

If we're talking about politicians, I'd say that both parties have moments of hypocrisy. On the whole, though, I'd say Republicans are bigger offenders.
user2

I would say itâ€™s definitely Republicans, and itâ€™s not really that close.
user1

I would agree, though, that both parties do have their moments of hypocrisy.
user1

It's especially hard for me to give them credit right now after the recent mass shootings.
user2

I totally agree with that.
user1

Their â€œgood guy with a gunâ€ theory absolutely did NOT hold up in this case.
user1

Especially since the "good guys" (aka police) apparently waited around for an hour+ rather than engage the shooter at the school
user2

Yes, that absolutely sickens me to think about.
user1

Very much. I think it's particularly hypocritical that they talk about mental health being the biggest issue here but will do absolutely nothing to fund such initiatives.
user2

Plus they were restraining parents or even placing them in handcuffs while the parents begged the police to do something.
user1

Yes, you are right about mental health too.
user1

Oh yeah. It was so hard to watch that video that's been circulating.
user2

They will say that itâ€™s not a gun issue, but a mental health issue, but will refuse to do something about that, too.
user1

No doubt. Political money, cowardice and hypocrisy are fueling so much of the problem.
user2

Very true.
user1