Well this one has a little bit of nuance, but I feel like the easy answer is republicans.

I believe the republicans are
user2

The general concept of "Every life is sacred" when talking about abortion, but then being pro-capital punishment is a big one.
user1

But there's also the quieter parts, the endless complaints about "socialism" but in turn actually being okay with things that are arguably "socialism" but they're for things Republicans care about, like businesses
user1

I am pro abortion, I believe it is a women's right to choose.
user2

Like, Dems don't get off scott free here
user1

There's some issues that largely have the messaging and realities of political positions line up
user1

Errr, not lining up
user1

Republicans care about business because they care about money, but what about the human concept of life. these things have to go hand in hand
user2

But that's less of a large scale issue as D's largely don't "fall in line" behind a party position in the same way
user1

While conversely R's stepping outside of party line is met with hard censure, like the recent issues with Liz Cheney
