All politicians are, but I think the republicans are more blatant about it
user1

I think the religious ties and moral arguments that Republican Party members and their supporters use in discourse make them more hypocritical, but I agree all politicians are.
user2

Like the ones who vote against something that is popular and then claim the good stuff in the bill in their fundraising
user1

Yeah the pushing of their religion on everyone goes against their 'small government' rhetoric as well
user1

Absolutely, or the fact that they claim to value life and children in the arguments for pro-life, yet once children are born they don't seem to care much about their well being or protection
user2

Yup, just like they voted against the emergency baby formula bill; they're pro-birth not pro life
user1

Small government when it comes to healthcare, welfare programs, or gun legislation, but not on immigration, military spending, tax cuts for the wealthy or many there things
user2

Exactly that's such a succinct way to put, pro birth but not pro life
user2

Not to mention where is there sympathy and funding for children in underprivileged communities or orphans who need to be adopted and cared for and are already alive!
user2

Yeah the foster system isn't a good situation but reform would cost money, and they only like spending money on the military.
user1

Absolutely, there's so much reform that could be dedicated to the children in this country, from the foster system, to the education system, to child preventative healthcare yet they wish to enrich themselves and the donors who get them elected
user2

Forget about even discussing climate change and making the planet for habitable and sustainable for future generations
user2

And any time gun control comes up they throw any excuse they can to muddy the water while they rake in contributions from firearm manufacturers and the NRA; like that ridiculous thing Ted Cruz said about there being too many doors in that school that just got shot up as being the real problem
user1

Exactly, they use that moral righteousness again..."oh it isn't the time for discussing actual policy its a time for prayer" such BS, so sickening
user2

Yeah I think I remember abbot blaming the wind turbines not being winterized for the gas plants failing 2 winters ago
user1

Instead of abiding by national power grid regulations texas just said nope and opted out of the national grid and it's been a disaster
user1

Right...Ted Cruz what a joke, they have no shame, to side step something while families don't get to get their loved ones back home because of the access to assault rifles that they champion
