That is a really tough question. I would have to say both parties are hypocritical, but republicans tend to be more hypocritical.
user1

I think it's a little of both. I see a few in the democratic party that seem to be selfish and hypocritical while, many on the respublican side continue to demonstrate such behavior.
user2

I agree with Hamster, as I mentioned before, it's both parties but the Republican's definitely take the prize on this one.
user2

I agree, I think republicans are a little more open about their hypocrisy by defending their actions. Whereas democrats are seen as wanting to help, but get in the way a lot.
user1

Like pro-life arguments being foster care and adoptions, but most republicans I know who have that argument are not willing to open their home to foster kids or people who need it. And they say all lives matter, but then seem to rank the importance of life differently.
user1

True! Democrats lack the "cunningness" with which Republican's seem to forward their agendas. While, that may be a great quality, it always allows Republicans to push their cunning agendas to the forefront and blame everyone else for all that is wrong in the present times.
user2

I agree, I feel like democrats kind of go "well, we tried" ðŸ’
user1

Yes! so true! but can we blane them? I mean look at these Republicans. They have zero ethics (in most cases). They'd rather let kids die than put forth "basic" laws that even 3rd world countries have in place.
user2

Unfortunately, that is heartbreakingly true. How many schools and churches and malls have to be a part of a mass shooting before both parties actually get things done. They both say they care about lives (in different ways) then let's start with keeping kids we have here safe first and foremost
user1

Watching Greg Abott speak last two days made me cringe. He simply lacks ANY emotional IQ and that is true for all his republican buddies. I mean the way they are acting at the moment makes me wonder if the "mental health" issue is within the party itself.
user2