Hi there, this is an interesting question, I definitely think that depending on the issue, both sides are often contradictory in their speech vs. actions.
user1

A recent issue that comes to mind as being particularly hypocritical though, is the Republican stance as 'pro-life', with lots of recent action on ending Roe v Wade and restricting access to abortion, but being opposed to common sense gun safety regulations that may prevent school shootings and senseless innocent deaths.
user1

Hello. I agree that both parties are at fault for hypocrisy depending on the issue. For example, Republicans believe in "pro-life" but refuse to do any reform in terms of gun control to protect lives of children. Democrats want a green future and make claims of carbon neutrality, but refuse to pass the Green New Deal.
user2

Cupcake, we had the same idea!
user2

We did! Must mean it's a fairly valid one!
user1

And I definitely agree that there are issues that Democrats make promises about, but do the opposite when it's politically convenient for them.
user1

I think there are some concerns about promises made in the last election (by Democrats) around eliminating rigorous voter registration restrictions that have historically made it more difficult for minority voters.
user1

I agree completely. The public often seems stuck in the wake of stalemate politics with not much being done to provide for a positive future.
user2

I think it's hard when there's absolutely no middle ground on the political stage. I think most Americans fall somewhere in the middle, or are more liberal or conservative on certain issues.
user1

I think a lot of people on both sides would be happy with some healthy compromises instead of all or nothing extremes.
user1

I also think most politicians will say anything to get elected, and incumbents will give the public a lot in an election year, only for it to dry up post election day.
user1

This rings true. The two-party system just doesn't work. If there were more parties to vote for, I imagine that we would endure less hypocrisy.
user2