Hi, Nikki. How are you today?

I'm good. and you?
user1

Just fine. So what are you thoughts on this topic?
user2

I think Republicans are more hypocritical for sure. One example being the pro-life laws. Fighting to make sure that women bring more human's into this world and then once you are born they want to pass laws that don't protect or help your life at all like cutting social funding for things like government assistance for the poor and fighting for gun rights that cause the loss of many many lives fairly regularly in America

Those are good points. I think this is a tough issue as any party can be subject to this. Currently, however, I believe that this is especially an issue in the Republican party, as well. There seems to be quite a lot of single issue focus, as you note, to the exclusion of other very important, and seemingly consistent issues. There is also the issue of the former president and many Republicans bending to his will and perspecitve, sometimes changing positions on issues to accommodate him.

Sorry for the misspelling there - "perspective."

Do you have any other thoughts on this topic you'd like to share?

I definitely agree with your points. Especially regarding our form POTUS. Although I don't agree with Republican policies in general, I think he really gave them such a bad name that I'm not sure I even put him in their camp to be honest. He followed the money and was overzealous with power. Trump was a democrat for most of his life, which kind of also speaks to his hypocracy.

Yes, it's hard to disentangle what that label even means anymore.

They also show hypocrisy in their values, touting patriotism and family values but creating bills that hurt families, vets, and go against the natural of democracy itself.
