On the 31st of March 2004 the Government of the Republic of Hungary adopted the new National Security Strategy of the Republic of Hungary (Resolution No. 2073/2004 (III.31.)). It entered into force on the 15th of April and thus replaced the former National Security Strategy (Resolution No. 2144/2002 (V.6.)).

The National Security Strategy of the Republic of Hungary

In the course of the Euro-Atlantic integration process that has been taking place since the regime change, Hungary has become a member of organisations of integration, in which the stability of the member countries is based on common values, democracy and the rule of law, as well as respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, with member states willing and able to help each other in order to protect the latter. Hungary's security situation is stable; the basic guarantee of its security is the co-operation taking place in the framework of NATO and EU. Hungary is not threatened by military aggression, and the risk of any other traditional type of threat is also minimal. At the same time, new challenges and threats have emerged that can only be effectively addressed through a governmental stance that co-ordinates our national efforts, and a well-focused development of our capabilities and their flexible application, as well as through wide-ranging international co-operation.

Resolution No. 94/1998. (XII. 29.) of the Hungarian National Assembly on "The Basic Principles of the Security and Defence Policy of the Republic of Hungary" sets out the fundaments of the country's security defence policy for the long term. Article 17 of the Resolution states that "the Government of the Republic of Hungary is responsible for the elaboration of the National Security Strategy and the National Military Strategy, as well as for their review, if required, and for the implementation of tasks deriving from them." With the approval of the National Security Strategy and by setting concrete tasks related to the elaboration of the National Military Strategy, the Government is now fulfilling its respective obligation. The National Security Strategy builds on Resolution No. 2144/2002 (V.6.) of the Government on the National Security Strategy of the Republic of Hungary, while the evaluation of the security environment, the definition of interests and the determination of goals, tasks and means reflect the changes that have taken place since the approval of the latter, with special regard to the integration-related tasks deriving from membership in NATO and the accession to the European Union.

The National Security Strategy builds on the Basic Principles of the Security and Defence Policy of the Republic of Hungary and is in line with NATO's 1999 Strategic Concept and the European Security Strategy adopted by the European Union in 2003. Its purpose is to identify - after having taken account of values and interests, and analysing the security environment and identifying risk factors and challenges - those tasks and means, through which Hungary may assert its national security interests in the international political and security system of the early 21st century.

It is on the basis of the National Security Strategy that sectoral strategies in the fields of military, national security, law enforcement, economics and finance, human resource development, information systems and protection, disaster-relief, environmental security and the fight against terrorism are being developed in a co-ordinated manner, setting tasks in the field of security in its broader definition.

I. VALUES AND INTERESTS

The Republic of Hungary defines security in a comprehensive way: besides the traditional political and defence components, it also contains, inter alia, economic and social, including human rights and minority rights-related, as well as environmental elements.

The Republic of Hungary is treating such traditional, closely interlinked and interdependent values as fundamental values as peace, security, stability, sovereignty, democracy, the rule of law, freedom of enterprise and respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. The Republic of Hungary provides for the security, prosperity and advancement of its citizens, as well as for the preservation of the cultural heritage and identity of the Hungarian people.

Globalisation and the increase of interdependence have resulted in changes to the substance and forms of appearance of national interests. As a consequence of the integration processes, the political and economic sovereignty of the state has been given a new substance, with a significant part of the particular national interests of the individual countries now embedded in the framework of common interests. Hungarian national interests can and need to be asserted in the framework of the Euro-Atlantic integration, which extends to policy and economy, as well as foreign and security policy and defence.

The Republic of Hungary considers as a national security interest

1. the preservation of its sovereignty, territorial integrity and constitutional order, as well as the implementation of democracy, political pluralism, the rule of law, freedom of enterprise, and of human rights and fundamental freedoms

2. the country’s stability and its economic, social and cultural development, the unfolding of its opportunities, the all-encompassing and rapid development of its economic, technological and human resources, its rapprochement to the level of the developed industrial nations, sustainable economic growth, the promotion of the security and prosperity of its citizens and the development of a security environment facilitating the fulfilment of these goals in a multi-fold manner;

3. the maintenance of international peace and security, and the prevention and resolution of regional, inter-state and intra-state conflicts in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and the norms and standards of international law;

4. the widening and deepening process of the European Union’s integration, the equality of rights and solidarity between the Member States, the enhancement of community methods, the increase of the effectiveness of the Common Foreign and Security Policy (CFSP), the enhancement of the European Security and Defence Policy (ESDP) as a means of CFSP, and the integration of Hungary in the institutional structure of the European Union, as well as the enhancement of its capabilities to assert its interests;

5. the durable preservation of NATO's central role in the Euro-Atlantic security system, the adaptation of NATO's activities to the changed security policy environment of the 21st century and the increase of its effectiveness, as well as transatlantic cohesion, including the United States' military presence and its active engagement in Europe, NATO's further enlargement on the basis of common values and interests serving the enhancement of collective security, and the enhancement of Hungary's role as an allied nation;

6. the general prevalence of democratic values, including their spreading beyond the Euro-Atlantic region;

7. durable stability and Euro-Atlantic integration of the countries of Central, Eastern and South-eastern Europe on the basis of the set of democratic values, and of the countries neighbouring Hungary in particular, and the broadest possible implementation of the rights of the Hungarians living in neighbouring countries;

8. durable stability based on the set of democratic values of Ukraine and Russia and their rapprochement to the organisations of Euro-Atlantic integration;

9. durable stability in the Euro-Atlantic region, a comprehensive settlement of conflicts in the region and the suppression of threats to the security of the region, in particular terrorism and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction;

10. constructive co-operation between all international actors - states, international organisations, as well as national and international non-governmental organisations, and the development of co-operation in bilateral, regional and multilateral frameworks, as well as that of multilateral economic co-operation.

II. SECURITY ENVIRONMENT - THREATS, RISKS, CHALLENGES

The range of security risks has increased in parallel with the broader definition of security. In addition to the traditional nation-state actors, the so-called non-state actors (international organisations, transnational companies, non-governmental organisations, as well as international criminal and terrorist groups) are playing an ever-increasing role in security policy. A particular feature of the international system in the process of restructuring is the simultaneous presence of traditional security risks and of new threats that are often taking a global shape and scope. The new types of challenges and threats are more multi-fold, less visible and less predictable. A typical tendency has been the blurring of the borderline between external and internal risk factors. Risk factors are manifesting themselves on global, as well as on regional and internal level, usually not separately but simultaneously, mutually reinforcing each other. The new challenges can be responded to most effectively through co-operation in the framework of international organisations and institutions and other forms of co-operation. Hungary's membership in the European Union and NATO entails both obligations to adapt and adjust itself and the opportunity of participating in decision-making and common action.

II.1. Global challenges

The process of globalisation accelerated and brought radical changes in all areas of international relations. Especially in the fields of technology, information technologies, transport, trade and finances, as well as public health globalisation has reached a degree where - along with its advantages - new types of security risks have appeared. Cross-border threats are having a great impact also on the international environment and the security of the Republic of Hungary.

II.1.1. Terrorism

The attacks on the United States that took place on 11 September 2001 have been an unambiguous indication that global terrorism has developed into a strategic threat to security in the Euro-Atlantic region as a result of the significant increase of its logistic, financial and operational capabilities. Terrorist activities are directed at disrupting democratic social and political institutions, and at undermining the trust of societies in their governments. Terrorism has a destabilising effect on international conditions, while activities serving the purpose of organising and supporting acts of terrorism (illegal arms trafficking, money laundering) are undermining the functioning of states and the international system. Acts of terrorism may contribute also to the emergence of other global - political, economic, commercial, migration- and health-related - crises.

II.1.2. Proliferation of weapons of mass destruction

The proliferation of (nuclear-radiological, chemical and biological) weapons of mass destruction and their means of delivery, as well as the spreading of technological skills required for their production and the possibility of their use, as well as the linkage between this threat and terrorism constitute the other strategic threat to security in the Euro-Atlantic region. Although the implementation of international agreements and export control regimes hinders the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and their means of delivery, the risk of such weapons and material to be acquired by terrorist groups and of reaching states providing support to terrorist groups and terrorism has been increasing. Besides states possessing or striving to develop weapons of mass destructions, states possessing the necessary technologies, raw material and experts also have a special responsibility to bear.

The proliferation of weapons of mass destruction constitutes a challenge in itself, since they may reach their targets also in non-conventional ways. Chemical and biological weapons that are relatively easy to produce but difficult to control constitute a particularly grave threat and are more likely to be used in the context of regional conflicts and acts of international terrorism. In addition, a number of countries are striving to acquire small- or medium-range means of delivery, either independently or in co-operation with other states, and thus to increase their regional role and influence. The proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and their means of delivery primarily constitutes an increasing threat in crisis spots, although the spreading of missile technology is indirectly jeopardising the security of Europe and the Euro-Atlantic region, as well.

II.1.3. Unstable regions, failed states

Countries of the world are receiving an unequal share of the benefits and burdens of globalisation. This results in an increase of their differences and makes the situation of those lagging behind even more serious. The increase of the poverty of people living in backward regions, the abridgement of their human rights and the appearance of extremist ideologies may lead to the spreading of corruption and a sharpening of ethnic and religious divergences as well as of internal conflicts, and eventually to the decline or collapse of statehood, as well as to intra-state or regional armed conflicts and, ultimately, to the destabilisation of entire regions. Such unstable regions and failed states may easily turn into hotbeds of cross-border organised crime and offer safe havens for terrorist organisations, and may increase the challenges of migration and the dangers of arms and drug trafficking.

II.1.4. Illegal migration

Hungary's borders are expected to remain the external borders of the EU and the Schengen area also for a longer term, which brings along the responsibilities and burdens of managing the Union's boundaries. Hungary, so far mainly a transit country, is now more and more becoming a target country. Hungary's Eastern and South-eastern neighbours addressed by the EU's common or communitarian policies vary according to their perspectives of European integration, their roles as points of departure or transit of migration, and to the intensity of their efforts against organised crime. We consider migration as a natural but complex phenomenon, presenting possible economic and demographic advantages as well as carrying security risks. Both opportunities and challenges can be exploited, i.e. managed most effectively in the framework of a medium or long-term perspective of European integration. Tackling these security risks efficiently is not only an obligation deriving from EU membership but is also required by our own national security interests. We must not rule out the possibility that criminal organisations or terrorist groups may try to use migration channels to establish or reinforce their positions in Hungary. Illegal migration appears first and foremost as a matter of law enforcement. Following the accession to the Schengen regime, an enhanced protection of the external borders -land borders, in particular - will require more effective co-operation between the Hungarian border-guard and immigration authorities. In preparation for our full-fledged participation in the Schengen co-operation, an up-to-date and secure border administration system needs to be parallelly developed, making effective use of the assistance available from EU resources. . We are handling security issues related to migration - including illegal migration - in the framework of international co-operation, paying special attention to the suppression of international organised crime and the prevention of acts of terrorism. In shaping our migration policy, we put particular emphasis on the particular aspects related to the sizeable Hungarian minorities living in the neighbouring countries.

II.1.5. Economic instability

Globalisation is the determining process of our age, extending economic co-operation to a worldwide dimension through the increase of mutual interdependence, and putting economic growth on a dynamic path through the mutual exploitation of advantages. It exerts significant influence on the nations' own economic policies, sets the main development tendencies and, based on the free flow of factors of production, accelerates international co-operation among enterprises. A negative consequence of globalisation has been that due to the increase of interdependence, problems and disturbances national economies are suffering from may easily spill over, causing trouble even in areas where national economic processes do not suggest it. From this point of view, the open Hungarian economy is considered as particularly vulnerable. The country's energy security is a particularly important component of economic security.

II.1.6. Challenges of the information society

With a view to avoiding the disadvantageous consequences of long-term lags, it must be an outstanding task for Hungary to catch up with the information and telecommunication standards of the developed world. Broadest possible familiarisation with the achievements of the IT revolution and the raise of the level of education are interests of crucial importance that are having an indirect positive impact on the economy, as well as on social life and the country's ability to assert its interests. In addition to providing the technical and intellectual conditions of an IT infrastructure, attention must be paid also to the protection of such systems and the generation of appropriate reserves. Information technologies have created numerous opportunities for the society but also increased the dangers it is exposed to. The vulnerability and overloading of computer networks and systems, theft of information, the spreading of viruses and disinformation all constitute factors of risk for the country.

II.1.7. Global natural, man-made and medical sources of danger

Problems appearing in the context of environmental protection and threats to civilisation spreading across borders constitute some of the largest-scale challenges to mankind. The protection of our natural resources, our natural habitat and values, as well as the preservation of the environmental balance is putting an ever-increasing burden on our societies. Such global problems as the destruction of rain forests, damages to the ozone layer, the greenhouse effect and the increase of air, water and soil pollution constitute a threat to our entire Earth. Natural and man-made disasters are having a particularly serious impact on countries with limited resources and backward economic systems. Due to Hungary's geographical characteristics, environmental and man-made hazards, floods, water and air pollution, as well as eventual disasters originating from neighbouring countries in the Carpathian Basin have particularly serious impact on Hungary. Environmental sources of danger have an indirect impact on the population's state of health and contribute to the appearance and spreading of dangerous epidemics and infections. The possibility of larger-scale crisis situations in the field of public health is likely to increase in the future.

II.2. Regional challenges

II.2.1. Central Europe

The development of the security situation in Central Europe has basically been characterised by positive changes. The majority of states in our immediate geographical vicinity have or will in the foreseeable future become NATO- and EU-members, while states not part of the enlargement for the time being have similarly committed themselves to the common Euro-Atlantic values, choosing integration as their means of advancement. The integration process and the extension of the zone of stability have brought favourable changes to both the internal situation of the countries of the region and their mutual relationships. The perspective of EU and NATO membership has proved to be an effective means of support to the democratisation and the market economy in the transforming states of Europe and to the shaping of their neighbourhood and regional policies.

II.2.2. South-eastern Europe

One favourable development in South-eastern Europe has been that the countries of the region committed themselves to the Euro-Atlantic values and expressed their intention to join the European Union and NATO. As a result of the crisis-management activities taking place as a common effort of international organisations (U.N., OSCE, NATO, EU), the threat of destabilisation in the region and of an outbreak of internal or interstate conflicts has diminished, with states of the region mostly heading in the direction of self-sustaining stability. However, Euro-Atlantic values continue to be applied to different extents, varying significantly from country to country. The slow pace of the political and economic regime change, and the corruption rampant in the societies, political structures and economies of certain regions, as well as social contradictions and unsolved national, ethnic, minority and religious problems are causing a slowdown in the endeavours for rapprochement and integration, and are creating favourable conditions for various forms of terrorism and organised crime, including human, drug- and arms trafficking in particular. Taking all these phenomena into account and the comprehensive role played by the EU in particular, there will be a need for a continued international presence also in the long run.

II.2.3. CIS-countries

The transformation processes of the successor states of the former Soviet Union have still not been completed, the establishment of economic and political structures has not been finalised, while elements of consolidation, predictability and the strive for partnership have become stronger. Hungary’s security in its broad definition is in several aspects affected by the new states’ search of orientation, the difficulties prevailing in the development of the Community of Independent States (CIS), the development of Russia’s manoeuvring space and the changes of its possibilities in the fields of foreign policy and external economy, as well as its political motivations, and by the situation of Ukraine. Organised crime and illegal migration emanating from the region and considering Hungary partly as transit, partly as a target country do constitute a threat to Hungary. Such pressure is likely to increase with our EU-accession but, on the other hand, the latter will enable us to take action by relying on community instruments, methods and support.

Russia continues to be an important factor in international politics because of its geographical scope, its natural and human resources and its military potential, and its nuclear power in particular. The dangers emanating from the country's internal instability have decreased but not yet completely disappeared. The comprehensive modernisation of its economy has not yet taken place despite the more favourable economic and financial outlook, and the functioning of democratic institutions does not correspond entirely with European norms, either. Russia has established relations of partnership with NATO and - in order to achieve its goals of socio-economic modernisation - the EU. It is a mutual interest for Russia and the states and organisations of the Euro-Atlantic region to be each other's stable and predictable partners.

Ukraine committed itself to Euro-Atlantic integration. Hungary has an interest in the successful socio-economic transformation of an independent and democratic Ukraine. Ukraine's stability, prosperity, the completion of its democratic reform processes, as well as its balanced relations with its neighbours, constitute an important factor of peace and security in our region. The deepening of that country's co-operation with European and Euro-Atlantic institutions constitutes a European and at the same time, a Hungarian security interest.

The socio-economic situation of the Caucasian and Central Asian successor states and their mutual relations have been burdened with social tensions, ethnic and religious differences, border problems, territorial claims, environmental problems and frozen conflicts, all of which are aggravated further by the manifestation of various forms of organised crime and terrorism. The democratic transformation and the establishment of a market economy has not yet been completed in the countries of this region, and possibilities of a destabilisation, the establishment of authoritarian regimes, as well as of the emergence of political, economic, social or environmental crises or even military conflicts must not be ruled out, either.

II.2.4. Mediterranean, Near East and Middle East

Several states of the Mediterranean region bordering Europe from the South are characterised by poverty, a rapid increase of the population and a lack of ability to join the processes of globalisation, as a consequence of which risks emanating from the region and connected with illegal migration and the spread of terrorism have lately been increasing. In its longer-term strategy, the European Union is striving to reduce these risks through the enhancement of partnership and political dialogue.

One particular feature of the Middle East conflict has been that political differences and territorial disputes also take a religious shape, and are aggravated further by the cultural differences between the various ethnic groups, historic sensitivities and the diverging endeavours of the international actors concerned. The permanent lack of resolution of this conflict constitutes one of the greatest risks to security from the point of view of world politics, including Europe, and thus requires outstanding attention. The conflicts of the Near and Middle East are closely linked to the security of the strategic energy sources, as well as to the endeavours striving for control of the latter. Besides terrorism, the endeavours striving for the acquisition of weapons of mass destructions and their means of delivery constitute the gravest security risk.

Due to the increasing globalisation, events in remote areas do have an impact on our security, too. As a NATO- and EU-member, Hungary will have to pay even greater attention than before to events taking place outside the Euro-Atlantic region, and will need to have a constructive position on the settlement of problems of geographically remote areas and to reckon with tasks to fulfil in relation to the latter.

II.3. Internal challenges

The development of the security situation of the Republic of Hungary is to a fundamental extent being influenced by the negative phenomena accompanying the process of socio-economic transformation such as poverty, and by the demand for co-ordination of regulatory processes.

II.3.1. Organised crime

Organised crime, which has gained in strength after the regime change, taking advantage of the uncertainties of socio-economic transformation, constitutes a threat to Hungary’s internal security. Organised criminal gangs have established relations with foreign criminal groups, with their activities covering the trafficking in drugs, arms, strategic materials, vehicles and human beings. A characteristic feature of organised crime has been that these groups are trying to assert their interests also beyond the economic sphere and are therefore increasing their legal economic activities and influence. The system of state control is not adapting to the changes effectively enough. It is therefore particularly necessary to enhance co-operation between the organisations responsible for control. Following the accession to the European Union, we will have to reckon with the increase of activities of crime gangs within the European Union and with an increase of their contacts with crime gangs operating in states outside the EU.

II.3.2. Illegal economy and corruption

The biggest challenge to the market economy and legality besides the illegal economy and organised crime is corruption, which is present in virtually all societies in one way or another, but constitutes a particular threat in economies in transformation. Illegal economy, corruption and organised crime are phenomena mutually reinforcing each other. Corruption is particularly dangerous if it appears in the framework of public life and authorities. Corruption may be countered through ensuring transparency of public life and by providing a sound legal framework guaranteeing the latter, as well as by co-ordinated activities of law enforcement and other authorities.

II.3.3. The spreading of drugs

In the field of illicit drug trafficking, Hungary may traditionally be considered as transit country between the producers and Western consumers. As a result of the increase of domestic demand, Hungary has also joined the ranks of consumer countries, which has a direct impact on the spread of crime, including organised crime. The ever-increasing seriousness of this problem is highlighted by regular or occasional drug use among school students and young people in general.

II.3.4. Political and religious extremism

Security challenges could also include extremist political and religious groups taking advantage of social tensions and using freedom of association, assembly and opinion ensured by the democratic rule of law to constrain the fundamental rights of others and disturb the functioning of constitutional institutions, or to promote their political endeavours.

II.3.5. Demographic challenges

Hungary is in unfavourable situation from the point of view of its demographic situation. The increase of the average age as well as the gradual decrease of the population will in time constitute challenges from two different points of view. On the one hand, the change of the ratio of age groups - due to changes in the ratio between economically active and passive inhabitants - will have a negative impact on the country's income-generating capacities, while on the other, increasing burdens on the side of expenditure (old-age pensions and health care) will impose increasing burdens on the budget, as well.

III. OBJECTIVES AND TASKS

Hungary is primarily providing for its security in the framework of membership in NATO and the European Union, in co-operation with its allies and partners. Membership in the organisations of integration increases Hungary's responsibilities, as well as its range of instruments and security policy activities serving the purpose of coping with threats and challenges. The goals and tasks to be fulfilled through the means available to the country emanate from Hungary's national interests and its global and regional environment. Hungary will be able to actively shape its security situation and environment only if it develops its capabilities in a deliberate manner and exploits the advantages offered by integration, and makes flexible use of the means and resources available, adapting to the changes. A requirement during the process of practical implementation of foreign and security policy is for the European and transatlantic elements of the country's Euro-Atlantic integration to appear in a balanced manner.

III.1. Goals and tasks related to international organisations

III.1.1. NATO

As a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation, Hungary enjoys the Alliance's guarantees, the purpose of which is to protect the territorial integrity, political independence and security of its member states. Along with the preservation of the Alliance's traditional defence tasks and capabilities, NATO's activities ever-increasingly include the management of crises emerging in the Euro-Atlantic region and beyond and the relations of partnership established with countries of these regions. Hungary has a fundamental interest in NATO remaining the primary forum of transatlantic security policy dialogue and co-operation, preserving its effectiveness by adapting to the changing security policy environment of the 21st century, and by contributing to the extension of the zone of security and stability.

Like other member states, Hungary contributes to the Alliance's adaptation and - both out of self-interest and in the spirit of fair burden sharing - takes part in the implementation of the tasks the Alliance needs to fulfil. It is making continuously renewed efforts to fulfil the political and military requirements stemming from allied co-operation, particularly those required by the implementation of military operations, and to adapt its own decision-making and crisis-management system to NATO's decision-making and crisis-management system, as well as to ensure public support for NATO's decisions and the resources and legal conditions required for their implementation. On the military and defence side, Hungary is striving for a substantial contribution to the entire spectre of allied missions, including participation in expeditionary operations outside the Euro-Atlantic region and ensures for the Hungarian defence forces to be able to contribute in a timely manner, and with appropriately trained and prepared forces to NATO-led operations, as well as to coalition-type operations carried out with allied participation.

III.1.2. The European Union

The European Union's Common Foreign and Security Policy represents an ever-increasingly important framework of Hungarian foreign policy. By laying the grounds of the Common Foreign and Security Policy, as well as those of the European Security and Defence Policy that serves as a means of the former, the Member States of the European Union have taken a significant step towards playing a greater role in world politics and the enhancement of the European Union's crisis management capabilities. In proportion to this, the European Union has been assuming a more and more important role in the enhancement of security and stability both in neighbouring and more remote regions, although for its member states NATO remains the basis of collective defence and the framework of its implementation. Hungary has also been taking an active part in the shaping of the European Union's Common Foreign and Security Policy. Hungarian foreign policy will have a stronger chance to represent its interests in the EU-framework as compared to what would result merely from the size of the country and its own capabilities. Besides, Hungary may also seize the opportunity of being an EU Member

State and exert a greater influence on global processes.

The objective of the Republic of Hungary as a Member State is to have an effective and strong EU, which is capable to act on the international scene as well, where the equality of rights and the principle of solidarity between Member States are respected, and where the community method strengthens with the institutional balance being preserved. It is a task of outstanding importance for Hungary to deepen the country's economic and political integration, as well as actively participate in all policy-shaping and decision-making bodies of the European Union. Embedding Hungarian foreign policy in the European Union needs to be based in the context of two dimensions. In strategic terms, efforts must be made for the Hungarian interests to manifest themselves as fully as possible in the external relations of the European Union, while on the other hand, there is a need to develop our manoeuvring space in a way that our diplomacy will not be diluted completely in the ever-deepening Common Foreign and Security Policy of the European Union. However, as a consequence of the EU's Common Foreign and Security Policy, Hungarian foreign policy with third countries will be based on common values.

All this does not exclude but rather requires us to play a determined and active role in favour of the assertion of our own particular national interests in those issues of vital importance to us that also constitute the cornerstones of the role played by the European Union on the international scene. This role covers issues such as close transatlantic co-operation, the enhancement of the partnership with the United States, the European Union's Neighbourhood Policy and the emphasis on its Eastern direction, the EU's engagement in the Balkans, and providing the perspective of European integration to the countries of that region, the broadest possible implementation of minority rights, as well as the shaping of EU policy towards the Mediterranean and the Middle East in its wider sense. Hungary has a particular interest in the democratisation of the Balkan countries. It is therefore an outstanding goal for Hungary to familiarise countries of the region with the advantages of joining the Euro-Atlantic security structures and to share with them our experiences gained from the accession process.

Hungary takes an active part in the realisation of the European Security and Defence Policy and in the implementation of military and civilian crisis management operation, mainly in its immediate vicinity but also beyond that. Furthermore, it seeks to be involved in the European structures and programmes to enhance defence capabilities, while preventing unnecessary duplications, and to develop those capabilities and forces, that may enhance its contribution to the European Union's activities in the field of crisis management - whether in a national or multinational framework -.

III.1.3. Transatlantic co-operation

As a power disposing of global military capabilities and a similarly strong ability to assert political and economic interests, and striving for the development of an international network of relations favouring the exercise of freedom, democracy and free enterprise, the United States plays an outstanding role in the network of international relations. The United States is the leading nation of the global fight against terrorism and of the North Atlantic Alliance. Similarly to other member countries of NATO and the European Union, Hungary traditionally shares the same values as the United States, as well as the advantages and burdens deriving from NATO-membership, and takes part in the fight against terrorism. The joint commitment to democracy, the rule of law and human rights constitutes the basis of the transatlantic link, binding Europe and North America together. Its most important components include political relations, economic as well as value-related, moral and cultural ties and NATO as the embodiment of collective security. However, the increasingly globalised world, the new types of threats and challenges and the sometimes significantly different approaches to handling the latter occasionally put the transatlantic cohesion to the test.

Transatlantic co-operation can be successful if Europe and North America - primarily in the NATO-framework - maintain a strategic dialogue on the threats and challenges menacing the Euro-Atlantic region, co-ordinate their actions against the latter and establish the capabilities required to this end, and create the political will necessary for the application of these capabilities. The success of conflict-management in the Euro-Atlantic region and its vicinity may be significantly increased if NATO and the European Union deepen the strategic partnership between the two organisations in the fields of crisis management and development of capabilities. There is a need for the co-ordinated application of military and non-military means available to the two organisations in the process of planning and implementing crisis-management and peacekeeping operations. It is Hungary's interest to see the enlarged, strong and united Europe result also in a stronger transatlantic partnership, in which smaller countries like Hungary are not forced to make a choice between Europe and the United States. It is Hungary's goal to remain a strategic partner of the United States also as a member of the European Union and to be a NATO-ally contributing to a stronger European engagement.

III.1.4. United Nations

The UN Security Council will continue to bear primary, but not exclusive responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. The UN is playing an important role in co-ordinating the collective efforts pursued in such fields as the protection of human rights, economic co-operation and development, non-proliferation and environmental protection. However, as a result of the events that have taken place in recent years, there has been an increasing demand among international actors for the adaptation of the legal and institutional grounds of the international community to the new challenges, and for the increase of the UN's effectiveness. The United Nations needs to play a stronger role in the co-ordination of international political, financial and international legal action against global terrorism as well as against organised crime, illicit drug trafficking and corruption, against the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and their means of delivery and in meeting threats posed by failed states, as well as the decrease of economic and social backwardness and the improvement of global environment protection. Hungary wishes to contribute constructively to enabling this universal organization to adapt to the new challenges, and takes an active part in the reform of the UN, as well as in UN-led peacekeeping missions.

III.1.5. OSCE

The OSCE is the only comprehensive European institution covering the three closely interlinked dimensions of security - military, economic and human - in their entirety and continues to play an essential role in promoting peace and stability, in enhancing security through co-operation and in implementing democracy and human rights. The OSCE is particularly active in the field of preventive diplomacy, conflict prevention, crisis management and post-conflict rehabilitation. An element of outstanding importance of the organisation's political-military dimension has been the existence of arms control regimes and confidence- and security-building measures. Hungary participates within the range of its possibilities in OSCE missions, in the protection of democracy, human rights and fundamental freedoms, as well as in the dialogue between cultures.

III.1.6. Economic diplomacy

Hungary's task is to further develop its participation in those regional economic organisations that play a crucially important role in shaping its security environment, as well as that of the neighbouring countries. The goal is to pursue mutually advantageous economic and trade co-operation, the conditions of which are decisively shaped by the World Trade Organisation (WTO) and the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD), as well as regional co-operation initiatives.

From the point of view of external economic policy, particular importance is attached to the WTO-negotiations aimed at shaping the rules of international trade. The implementation of agreements to be reached as a result of these talks will entail obligations for Hungary as an EU-member. Membership in the EU also results in new challenges to Hungary's participation in the OECD. At this professional forum Hungary will continue to have the possibility to express its opinion as an independent member state during the discussions on common sectoral policies - including trade policy issues -, and Hungarian participants will maintain close professional contacts with the representatives of EU member states and other OECD-members.

Transatlantic trade relations are providing direct external economic advantages for Hungary but are also important since the stability and predictability of the world trading system may only be improved if relations between the EU and the United States are exempt of major tensions. A stronger market presence requires export-promoting activities. Due to our interests in developing trade relations with the countries of South-eastern Europe, we shall endeavour to promote the improvement of conditions for trade between those countries and the European Union.

III.2. Relations with countries of the region

III.2.1. Relations with the countries of the region on bilateral and regional level

One of the most important tasks of Hungarian foreign and security policy is to actively contribute to ensuring stability in the regions of Central Eastern and South-eastern Europe, and in particular to the democratic transformation of neighbouring countries, as well as to the safeguarding of the general promotion of human rights with special regard to rights of national and ethnic minorities corresponding to European norms and standards. To this end, Hungary actively supports the endeavours of countries of the region aiming at Euro-Atlantic integration and the admission of countries that are prepared and fulfil the respective criteria. We are paying great attention to cross-border co-operation, and forms of regional co-operation stretching beyond borders. Hungary needs to play an active role in the activities of such fora and initiatives of regional co-operation as the Visegrád Co-operation, the Central European Initiative and the Quadrilaterale. We deem it important to preserve the dialogue between countries previously or recently admitted to NATO and EU and those expected to accede in the future, as well as to prevent the emergence of new dividing lines. The issue of what kind of role regional organisations and groupings such as the Visegrád co-operation may play following integration requires further examination.

Hungary has an interest in ensuring stability and democratic transformation in the region of South-eastern Europe. To this end it will need to exert a stabilising impact on the region. One of the tasks of Hungarian foreign and security policy is to take an active part - in co-operation with its Euro-Atlantic allies and international organisations such as the UN, OSCE, NATO and the EU - in crisis management operations taking place in the region, and in efforts aiming at the development of structure of the rule of law, of democratic conditions and of capabilities required for effective government. We need to assist our Eastern and Southern neighbours in their institution-building as well as their rapprochement to the zone of freedom, security and law, as well as their ultimate accession through the inclusion of European sources, as well as on a bilateral basis, providing Hungarian financial assistance, as well as by sharing our experience gathered in the course of the regime change and our integration. We need to enable Hungarian experts from the fields of public administration, law enforcement, as well as legal and economic experts to contribute with their experience to post-conflict management, as well.

III.2.2. Hungarians living in neighbouring countries

Hungary supports the concept, according to which Hungarians living in neighbouring countries must enjoy forms of self-government and autonomy that best fit their particular situation and the rights deriving from them, in accordance with European practice, as a community and remaining in their native lands. The fulfilment of these goals is inseparable from the social and economic development of the countries where Hungarian minorities live. With their active involvement, the Republic of Hungary may contribute significantly to stability in the region and strengthen its relations with neighbouring countries. Hungary therefore has a particular interest in the enhancement of processes leading to the consolidation of democracy, the rule of law and market economy in the region, and in promoting the integration of its neighbours into the Euro-Atlantic and European political and security structures. Hungary wishes to fulfil its tasks related to support the Hungarian minorities living in neighbouring countries in the legal frameworks provided by the institutions of integration, and in co-operation with the legitimate representative bodies of the communities in question, by means of diplomatic and economic co-operation and with the governments of the countries concerned.

III.2.3. CIS-countries

Hungary is strongly interested in the continuation of democratic transformation in the CIS- countries, in their rapprochement to the Euro-Atlantic structures and the political settlement of conflicts with the inclusion of all the parties concerned. We consider the situation of Russia and Ukraine as of crucial importance from the point of view of security in the region and are therefore particularly interested in the stability of these two states and in the advancement of their democratic reforms, as well as in the success of their economic and social modernisation processes. Changes in a favourable direction may be facilitated by close links between rapprochement to and integration into Europe and the reform processes in Ukraine and Russia, if integration is aiming at enhancing internal reforms and is depending on their speed. One of the tasks of Hungary as a NATO- and EU-member is to alleviate the effects of European dividing lines emerging as a result of the enlargement processes and to identify the possible areas of engagement.

Economic relations with Russia and Ukraine are of strategic importance to Hungary. We are striving for the development of bilateral relations with Russia in all their aspects. We support the co-operation between Russia and the West based on mutual interest to extend to the widest possible range of fields and for such co-operation to be facilitated by an ever more dynamic EU-Russia co-operation with stronger perspectives and by political dialogue and practical co-operation between NATO and Russia. Hungary also supports the maintenance of Ukraine’s stability and its democratic transformation as well as its rapprochement to the structures of Euro-Atlantic integration by all the means available. Achievement of these goals is being facilitated by our participation in the emerging new neighbourhood policy of the European Union, notably the practical implementation of the concept on a “European Neighbourhood Policy”.

III.3. Action against global threats and challenges

The mutually reinforcing impact of old and new types of challenges and the complexity of the factors shaping the international security environment requires the continued adaptation of states, international organisations and the international security system, as well as wide-ranging co-operation among the members of the international community, in which the strategic partnership between NATO and the EU may play a determining role. For Hungary, active participation in international organisations as well as in international coalitions set up for the management of certain particular problems offer the most favourable conditions for Hungary to cope with global challenges

III.3.1. Terrorism

Protection against terrorism can only be successful by means of enhancing bilateral and regional co-operation, joining forces on the broadest possible international level and co-ordinated action of international organisations. The fight against terrorism requires an integrated approach that should include, inter alia, means of prevention and intervention, joint international efforts aiming at eliminating the material basis of terrorism, and the protection of critical infrastructure. The UN provides an important forum for the international community to agree on the ways and means to handle this problem. The framework of the European Union provides an opportunity to develop common action plans, as well as actions concerning the EU's internal security and its external relations. If there is a need for military action in order to avert the terrorist threat, NATO's capabilities will be put in the focus. Hungary's goal is to support international efforts in all these three organisations, which are in the also supposed to serve our country's security.

Hungary must take part in the Euro-Atlantic and other international activities serving the purpose of joint assessment, evaluation and management of the risks of terrorism. The co-ordination of respective activities and the establishment of the domestic conditions required to this end are tasks manifesting themselves at governmental level. Hungarian diplomacy needs to take part in the international co-ordination of the fight against terrorism, while national security services and law enforcement authorities will - besides other basic activities stipulated by law - have to participate in the international co-operation that aims at the effective detection and prevention of intentions aiming at carrying out such activities. An effective stance requires organisations concerned to be properly trained and equipped and to be able to adapt quickly and flexibly.

III.3.2. Proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and their means of delivery

Another task of the Hungarian foreign and security policy, also related to the international fight against terrorism, is to actively contribute to the prevention of the proliferation of missile technologies and weapons of mass destruction in the framework of international non-proliferation regimes, and to the reduction of risks deriving from the latter. As a member of the international export control regimes, Hungary actively contributes to the enhancement and further development of international legal instruments and agreements in the field of non-proliferation. Due to the global character of this challenge, only the further deepening of international co-operation may produce durable results: as a participant in such co-operation, and besides its diplomatic and administrative (controlling and licensing) activities, Hungary needs to develop also its physical capabilities of detection and protection against such weapons. Hungary has traditionally been playing a well-respected role in the field of disarmament and arms control, and will continue to do so.

III.3.3. Regional conflict management, state-building, humanitarian assistance

Hungary is interested in the suppression of risk factors threatening stability in the Euro-Atlantic region. As a NATO- and EU-member, Hungarian foreign policy faces increased responsibilities, as well. The handling of regional instability and failed states is depending to a great extent on whether the countries and regions concerned will succeed in embarking on the road of self-sustaining social and economic development. Assistance provided by the international community will first and foremost have to be aimed at enabling backward states and regions to ensure their own development through the mobilisation of internal reserves, to operate democratic institutions, strengthening statehood and to rehabilitate their respective economies. Active participation of international organisations and institutions, including through the fulfilment of military tasks, is required primarily for the development of the capabilities needed for self-sustaining development, and for the creation of an environment favouring internal development. Hungary will continue to be ready to contribute to international political, diplomatic, military, law enforcement and humanitarian efforts aiming at the elimination of dangers threatening the security of the Euro-Atlantic region, whether from within or outside.

III.3.4. Schengen co-operation, border management, migration

As a member of the European Union, Hungary will adopt the migration and immigration practices of the EU member states, which requires the adjustment of institutional and legal conditions to EU-standards. Hungary needs to prepare for the earliest possible and full application of the Schengen regime. This will require not only an effective functioning of Hungarian border authorities but also smooth co-operation among all authorities involved in immigration-related procedures. We have to modernise the management of our borders now becoming part of the external border of the European Union in such a way that they may not be perceived by our neighbours who are to join the EU at a later stage as a new iron curtain, but rather as a place and means of transparency and co-operation. This also includes the updating of our visa practices according to Schengen norms, considering that the first line of defence of the external border is the visa-issuing consular authority. The adequate training of institutions and persons authorised to issue visas and the reconciliation of security considerations with economic interests are tasks of outstanding importance to this end. We need to actively support the further development of common refugee and migration policies at EU-fora, including the gradual budgetary implementation of burden sharing, which applies also to the integrated management of the external borders. The development of border protection may provide an outstanding field of the exchange of experience with the countries of the region (in order to push the pervious border as far from our country as possible). We need to apply the EU’s up-to-date approach, which strives to contribute to the elimination of the factors generating migration through development co-operation based on clear criteria. It is necessary to strive for that the capacities of the Hungarian society to integrate immigrants to reach the average level of the European Union and to increase its receptivity by providing balanced information. It is important for any legislation on migration to take the sizeable Hungarian minorities living in the neighbouring countries into account and to ensure the assertion of our economic interests.

III.3.5. Development co-operation

As a member of the international donor community, Hungary strives to support the economic and social progress of underdeveloped countries and contribute to the reduction of poverty as well as of the unfavourable effects of globalisation, in the framework of partnership, by adapting itself to the EU’s development policies, the UN’s Millennium

Goals and the OECD-guidelines. Development co-operation programmes also need to involve non-governmental organisations and the Hungarian stakeholders. International development co-operation programmes are parts of the programmes aiming at conflict prevention and post-conflict rehabilitation, as well as of humanitarian assistance related to peacekeeping, thus contributing to the achievement of the country's security policy goals.

III.3.6. Challenges to open societies

A significant part of the global challenges is directed against one of the three values: freedom, security and justice, or even more against their synthesis, posing particular threats to open societies. The achievements under this trinity of values need protection. Remarkably, however, their external protection may be best ensured through their promotion in more remote parts of the world. This complex challenge affects all countries belonging to the Euro-Atlantic region. It can only be effectively tackled through common action and closest possible co-operation with the European Union, and in co-operation aiming at the deepening and extending of the area of freedom, security and justice.

Terrorism, cross-border organised crime, corruption potentially undermining democratic institutions as well as illegal, massive and unmanageable migration have one consequence in common: the countries concerned often find an answer to these phenomena at the expense of the curtailment of fundamental freedoms and the rule of law, mainly relying on law enforcement. Successful action, however, is not possible through mere law enforcement measures, but only with the strengthening of the institutions of democracy, human rights and the rule of law. It is Hungary's interest that the delicate balance between values and interests, the synthesis of freedom and security are found in a way, which respects the standards of fundamental freedoms and the rule of law.

III.3.7. Protection of information systems

The age of rapid technological development has brought along the new task of developing a modern and secure infrastructure of information and of protecting governmental information systems. Such systems must be prepared to prevent and avert cyber attacks. Successful protection requires close co-ordination with allies, as well as information and telecommunication providers and research centres.

III.3.8. Protection of the natural and human environment

In order to provide for its ecological security and in accordance with the principles of sustainable development, Hungary deems it important to preserve its natural resources, as well as its protected and non-protected natural habitat and its protected natural treasures. Effective handling of global environmental and public health problems requires broad-based - regional and global - international solidarity, in which Hungary must also play an active part. In order to ensure sustainable development, there is a need to change certain production and consumption habits endangering the environment, as well as to spread environment-friendly or environment-close technologies and to take co-ordinated steps in the domains of economic policy and international law. Hungary takes part in international initiatives, as well as in the implementation of action programmes launched by the EU, UN and OECD, and - to the extent of its possibilities - in remedying international problems. It strives to ensure for its future industrial development to follow the principles of sustainable development, and for its economic competitiveness not to endanger the state of its natural habitat, as well as for the preservation of protected natural areas and their value. In order to avert natural and man made disasters and eliminate its consequences, Hungary closely co-operates with the countries of the region and applies the rules of the European Union and NATO's civil emergency planning system.

III.4. Action against internal challenges

III.4.1. Fight against organised crime

Eliminating the extensive economic background of criminal gangs and preventing the legalisation of their financial means constitute tasks of fundamental importance in the context of successful action against organised crime. It is on the basis of this point of departure, that the Penal Code, as well as laws on penal procedures, needs to be further developed and that the effectiveness of tax control as well as the fight against corruption have to be increased. The work of judiciary, law enforcement and correctional services needs to be made more successful, increasing co-ordination between the authorities concerned and improving their technical equipment and organisational conditions. Due to the nature of the problem, co-operation between Hungarian and foreign authorities needs to be further deepened and extended.

III.4.2. Illegal economy and corruption

The national strategy of the fight against corruption includes elements aimed at the suppression of the illegal economy: permanent and effective supervision of the flow of public money, transparency of the legal system and the functioning of the state, as well as the appropriate selection and appreciation of public servants. Primary means of the fight against the illegal economy include the reduction of public burdens as well as the development of tax, legal and customs rules and consequently ensuring the application of the latter. Outstanding attention needs to be paid to preventing the endeavours of criminal gangs from establishing contacts with representatives of politics, public administration, the judiciary, armed forces and law enforcement, as well as of the media.

III.4.3. Fight against the spreading of drugs

Education plays a crucial role in the fight against the spreading of drugs. Prerequisites of determined action against distributors and suppliers of drugs include increasing the effectiveness of detection, the improvement of the technical equipment and of the skills of the personnel, as well as exchange of information and co-operation with international partners. Distinguished attention needs to be paid to the spreading of new synthetic drugs.

III.4.4. Political and religious extremism

The Republic of Hungary has a fundamental national security interest in providing for its competent state authorities to prevent and impede any endeavour aimed at disturbing the exercise of fundamental human rights and the functioning of the country's democratic system or its constitutional institutions. Successful containment of political or religious extremism may in the long term be achieved through a more successful management of those social problems that may create bases or circles of sympathisers of such tendencies.

III.4.5. Demographical challenges

Due to our present-day social structure, the present form of the welfare state cannot be maintained even during times of economic growth. This negative process may be reversed through an increasing role of self-care and through a carefully designed demographic and immigration policy that includes fostering the willingness to have children.

IV. INSTRUMENTS TO IMPLEMENT THE NATIONAL SECURITY STRATEGY

A national economy steadily moving on a path of growth may provide favourable conditions for the implementation of the National Security Strategy. The stability of Hungary's democracy and security needs to rely on solid economic and civilisational fundaments, which, on the one hand, provides for the resources of an effective security policy, and on the other, increases the country's recognition through the enhancement of the country's stability and national identity. Hungary's long-term goal is to catch up with the advanced European countries by means of its economic performance. Instruments to fulfil this strategic goal include: the increase of economic competitiveness, the pursuit for financial and price stability, as well as to unfold the cohesive forces of the economy and the society.

In its efforts to provide for its security, Hungary is primarily relying on political means, taking advantage of the opportunities of diplomatic, economic and cultural co-operation. The main guarantee of the country's military security is provided by allied co-operation taking place in the framework of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation. Hungary needs to possess the military capabilities required for the collective defence of Hungary within the framework of NATO and for the collective defence of its allies, as well as capabilities required for crisis management and peacekeeping operations and disaster-relief launched with the participation of NATO-allies. Hungary needs to be able to participate also in crisis-management activities taking place within the framework of the European Union. The Hungarian Defence Forces need to possess rapidly deployable and sustainable forces suited for flexible use and available also for expeditionary operations that are able to co-operate with allied forces and can be used in crisis spots without any geographical limitations. The necessary capabilities need to be developed in a way co-ordinated with NATO, co-ordinating force contributions committed in the NATO and EU framework, and by making use of the opportunities lying in bi- and multilateral international cooperation and development programs. The goal is to develop an armed force that is new in the sense of operational philosophy, able to fulfil the commitments made to NATO, that is financially affordable, capability-based and specialised in the framework of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation, that constitutes an integral part of the society and enjoys the latter's support, that is placed under democratic and civilian control, and that is composed of members committed to their countries and profession, properly trained and motivated, commanding the respect of the society. Respective goals and tasks need to be set down in the National Military Strategy.

Besides military operation, law enforcement, medical, humanitarian and activities of civilian nature are also playing an ever-increasing role in crisis management operations undertaken by the international community. The geographical distribution of such operations has changed as well; besides the Western Balkans and the European peripheries (e.g. Caucasus), Central Asia and the Middle East have increasingly moved into the focus of international crisis management. As a result of membership in the UN, OSCE, NATO and the EU, Hungary has to prepare for an increasing and permanent involvement in the fields of crisis management and peacekeeping. Our goal is for the Hungarian participation in international operations, based on national interests, to be appropriately timed and substantial. In order to promote the effectiveness of such Hungarian participation, there is a need to assess human and material resources to be used, as well as to contribute a co-ordinated and transparent structure avoiding duplications and ensuring flexible response from the public and budgetary perspectives alike.

National security services help defend the country's sovereignty and constitutional order and assert its national security interests by carrying out their activities as set down by Law. By providing information required for governmental decisions, natural security services need to directly support the process of preparing decisions and the elaboration of appropriate alternatives of such decisions. They need to inform the Government on the current and long-term development of external and internal vulnerability of the country. Information gathering must extend to global, regional and internal sources of danger alike. In order to detect and eliminate sources of threat, national security services need to pursue preventive and intelligence activities alike. During this process, changes taking place in the region, integration processes, new types of challenges and threats will need to be taken into account, as well as threats to Hungarian institutions operating abroad and to Hungarian units and experts taking part in crisis management and peacekeeping tasks. National security services need to pay distinguished attention to the participation in the fight against cross-border international terrorism. According to the security challenges Hungary is facing, they need to develop and maintain a new type of co-operation with the civilian and military national security services of allied states as well as with respective services of other states sharing an interest in attaining the goals identified in the National Security Strategy.

Successfully coping with the challenges to security requires closer co-operation between the various institutions of law enforcement and the modernisation of their respective structures. In the framework of the ongoing reform of the Hungarian Police, detection and prevention of organised crime, and of crimes related to drugs, arms trade, international terrorism and money laundering in particular, as well as action against cyber-crime must be enhanced by making use of the potential of international co-operation. With the context of police reform, the organisational structure needs to be transformed in order to bring its services much closer to the citizens to be protected and their property. Co-operation between national security services and law enforcement authorities - as well as armed forces, if necessary, and the improvement of co-ordination between these bodies and other authorities entitled to supervisory activities constitute a significant reserve of our national security.

The changing set of tasks of the Hungarian Border Guards, the increased protection of the EU's external borders as well as the development of the controlling system of internal borders also require a transformation of the organisational structure and a linkage to be established between the border protection and law enforcement activities. It is our basic interest for the future external borders not only to serve our own national security but the security of the entire European Union.

Disaster-relief forces (civil defence, fire department) protect the lives of the population and its material assets in times of natural and man-made disasters and of states of emergency, also in co-operation with designated units of the armed forces, if required. The conditions and the guidelines for the development of capabilities of disaster-relief have been laid and co-ordinated by the National Disaster-Relief Strategy. Specially prepared units of the armed forces and their means supplement the capabilities of these organisations to prevent and relieve natural and man-made disasters by carrying out special kinds of activities of technical nature.

V. SECTORAL STRATEGIES

As a result of the comprehensive definition of security, the tasks derived from the implementation of the National Security Strategy are divided among sectoral policies. The task of sectoral strategies is to elaborate, within the frameworks laid out by the Hungarian National Assembly's Resolution No. 94/1998 (XII.29) on the Basic Principles of the Hungarian Security and Defence Policy, and on the basis of the values, interests and goals set out in the National Security Strategy of the Republic of Hungary, and in a manner specified according to the particular features and fields of the sectoral branch concerned, the practical modalities of the preservation of the external and internal security of the Republic of Hungary. Sectoral strategies can be successful if their elaboration and implementation takes place in a co-ordinated manner. A dialogue and practical co-operation with non-governmental organisations may facilitate the implementation of the National Security Strategy.
