Clean food, air and water are essential parts of the common welfare of the people of the world. The cost of pollution in health care costs and preventable deaths is higher than the cost to clean up the mess. Therefore, cleaning up the environment is a cost-conscious endeavor. Better still is not polluting in the first place, a point most companies seem to not appreciate. Encouraging our retirement accounts to invest in companies that are actively pursuing environmentally, socially, and corporate governance minded practices helps drive those practices forward, improving life for all of us. Killing customers with toxic chemicals is not a viable business strategy. Governments that allow companies to kill their citizens are failing their first duty.
