Eh, I can't really elaborate on Assassin's Creed without a lot of spoilers, but I don't think that's religious at all.

Aside from that, no. Religions, for better or worse are a huge part of the human experience. What better way to tie something unbelievable in your story to a medium with an already huge following? To be honest I don't know what you mean when you ask if they're going too far.

I do wish that the writers were more creative with their stories sometime, but who would want to play games that were completely realistic? If the games didn't have magic, mutations, and supernatural powers, who would want to play them? It would be all wargames and simulators all the time. No one would want to play an rpg where you were a postman or a frycook.

I think if that were the case, they'd be more likely to attack Hindu or other religions far different from Christianity before going after Muslims.

Mmm, I don't think gaming has gone as far as other forms of media have-- then again, compared to movies and music it's relatively new. To be quite honest I haven't played anything that I would call, "OMG I can't believe they went there!" based on religon and this is from someone who's a Christan. Course I would never play a game that allows me to kill Jesus or something like that; even if I was given the choice. Just like the other guy said about Dragon Age, if done in a tasteful manner I have no problems with it. Just no Christian Blood Bath the game, please.

It's everywhere. Everybody makes it about a "religion war" while the suits wreak the profits. Besides, good people are good people. Being a Chrsitian doesn't make you "good" by default.

Some people in the military actually wanted Christian propaganda written on M16s so people would know "who they're fighting for" (for example). And yes, it is "like that" for those who fall for it (or the spinners). I think it's a horrible thing.

That's what it's really all about, "yourself" as a human, as an individual. Not this crap, or that crap. It's what you have inside of yourself is what really matters and I honestly think the biggest "sin" of all is to deny and lie to yourself. No matter what it happens to be.

Its easy to get off-topic when talking about things like religion. The fact is, religion is a part of our world that all of us are aware of and it has a large impact on the way we live whether we believe in it or not. To say we shouldn't have it in our games is naive. It will find its way into our games as it has found its way into many other forms of media and it will increasingly do so.

The bigger question is how it is to be portrayed and experienced in our games. As gamers, some lines are taken for granted I.E. preaching or conforming to a certain belief is a negative thing as are ridiculing or informal fallacy (in trying to debunk or prove that religion's believe doesn't exist). But where is the line drawn between being creative and imaginative thinking and offending a large group of people at the cost of entertainment?

the right to say "Well if you don't like it, don't play it!" or "Its just a game."? Thats like looking away from a problem and annoucing that the problem is now solved.

No doubt all of us have our own beliefs, but I would hope there is a common ground where we can agree when something is taken too far by using tolorence on one end, and respect on the other. But being the world hasn't gotten there yet, I would suggest religion should find its way into gaming very slowly and cautiously or risk deviding and losing a large player base, which would effect gaming as a whole, and eventually yourself.

the real question is, is there something wrong with video games in religion?

as long as it's not made with the sole purpose of pushing their religion or trying to convert people, i don't care. They were able to back in the pixelated days but nowadays i doubt those nutjobs could even get an image up on the screen.

I'm Christian, and I've never ever been offended or pissed at videogames for using too much sex/violence/religious themes.

Well ACII pissed me off, but it's not for the religious "thing", only for its nonsense modern-day plot. And yes, that disclaimer at the beginning is quite funny.

Fact is, I know I'm playing videogames, I'm not in church. With that in mind, I know I won't necessarily agree with everything I hear or see. I try to keep an open mind towards video games.I want to be entertained with stuff like awesome storylines (Bioshock), great atmospheres (Fallout 3, Bioshock, Demon's Souls), non-stop fun (Borderlands, R&C) technical achievements (Uncharted 2) or a combination of all (Zelda OoT :D).

Maybe one day I'll play a game that will offend me to the point I'm disgusted or something. I hope not, but it might happen.

As a Christian, I think it's fine. I think it could go overboard but I can't think of a good example where it has. I think that if they have a reason to put religion in a game, it's fine. I don't want them to say "God bless you" everytime there's a load screen, but if they can put it into the story or at least have a reason to put it in, I'm fine with it. Like Dante's Inferno is based off of a poem and the setting is hell, therefore if they didn't put it there then that would be weird and the fact that they did is fine.

EDIT: Actually you could debatably say that the bible game for the PS2 (actual game) went overboard but then again, anyone who buys it will be knowing what they are getting so it doesn't count. I just don't want games using religion to a point where I buy assassin's creed 3 and the entire time they are telling me about how God is coming to save us all throughout the entire game (not saying this post is right, just saying I don't want that to happen)

That's actually a really good point about assassin's creed 2, back then religion was a big deal, so they incorporated it, but I still think they did a fine job, didn't bother me in the slightest.

That's a good point on AC1 but, AC2 had a lot of historians working with them and based on their beliefs.
